THE

EAST INDIA SKETCH-BOOK:

Feels to each action of the varied day fire down of hearthment. The very sir Couls not his howe as in he netire shand.
The scene is strange the food is loatily to him;
The language, pay the moisic, jury in east.
Walter 2007.

NEW YORK:

THEODORE FOSTER, .

BASEMENT ROOMS, CORNER OF FINE-STREET AND BROADWAY

MOCCCXXX

INTRODUCTORY.

Isou, the land of enchantment—the treasure hoose from which imagination culls its brightest images of splendour,—the "golden orient," glittering in the best brilliance of sun and song,—peopled by the creations of "The Arabian Nights,"—the Chersonese, abounding "in gold and silver, and all manoer of precious stones,"—land of promise and hope!

What a violage seems in the perspective to invite the hand of the reaper! Its fragrance is walted over hills and oceans, and there are reapers also who have gathered and oceans, and there are reapers also who have ga tasted, and found the harvest—dust and ashes!

We have enough of the blessed sunshine to wither away the flowers of life, and palsy the best energies of the mind, and we have wherewithal to eat and drink with what appetite we may

One can almost hear the ebbing of the waves of time as they roll heavily and sultrily away. Yet what a field for the exercise of a laudable curiosity is spread out around us! Strange, wonderful in their unchangeableness, is tha race amidst whom we dwell! We wander, as it were, amongst the patriarchs of ancient days,—we travel back three thousand years into the past—we are contemporaries of the ages that entombed the Phirachs. The "oxen tread out the corn oround us," and "the camele go to wa treat the well" and "two women are grinding corn at the mill," and familiarity makes us forget that these things were thus when the steward of Abraham first met the fair Rebekah at eventide, on his journey for the bride of his master's her.

Therefore—the fiend enum glaring hornbly from the free position of my little writing table,—the cacoethes acribend being full on me,—the very silence of the air tempting to contemplation, and to the delightful wandering of unfettered thought,—to airly projects of some work of lancy that may not be all unworthy of this Augustin era—therefore will also essay to be "one of the Prophets"

What, then, shall I write? "Ay, there's the rub" A series of "Essays on the Statistics, Economy, Political and Moral, of British India, &c ?* Pshaw!—the dear Public never read such things now a-days; rim cot arr have no desire that the secrets of Eastern diplomacy should be revealed, and the few are more deeply instituted than I am Besides, who writes for the few? A novel—a sketchi—a caricature-letters-dramas-why not all?

My hand fell on Minmara's Belsharzan," and I read, devoured, and hoped to catch the inspiration What a pity one forget as often the effects of a visit to the "Regia Solide" In virtue of the fine field to the course, and discovered to the state of the first took course, and the course for the first took course, and the state the state of the deep, the sepulchral mystery of Kantas Around me were unnumbered hells; above me lay he vastiness of the deep, the sepulchral mystery of Kantas Around me were unnumbered hells; above me the tombs of the mighty who had passed away. I was in the scene of Aurragazhe's story, I was in the world of things unknown, lying beyond the themes of hoary antiquity. I had a Brahmin, too, for a pirest; I had a youthful lover, and an enthusiast heroine; and, as i gazed, I warmed into courage, and began.

Scene the First

Rozah, the summit of the hill that overlooks the vale and villege of El-

Stmandare —Ellaman

SIMARDARE.

At my approach how ance thy awate sys beam'd! The young grazin ne'r bounded hat's high! As 10-nd to gract my comer. And thy suite,— The young grazin is ne'r bounded hat's high! As 10-nd to gract my comer. And thy suite,— This found have the time duying a beat period. This found have the time duying a beat period. This found have the suite of the suite of

I know not, care not what -- whate'er it be, It rends thee from me, and I curse it therefore Accurated be it!

ELLAMAR

Simahdree, peace!
I tremble at thy madness! Feel at thou not—
But no! flow canst not—unto me 'tis given To know what rewless forms are hovering near,
And I command thee, peace!

"And thus, you know," continued I to my companion, interrupting his slumber on a neighbouring couch, "the dialogue is to go on, Simahdree inquiring, and doubting, and suspecting, and she mystic and mystifying, until, half in anger, half in fear, he leaves her, and she solidoquizes about the gods and the spirits, and celestial influence, and the moon, and the stars."

"Yes yes, I understand," replied my friend, "n speech after the most approved model Well, and what then?"
"Then I shall place the scene in the pillared hall of Kai lass I shall have it dimly illuminated, and I shall bring the High Brahmin and Eliamah into its recesses. After he has assured her that she has been selected by tha prosting divunity of the Cues,—you know it is an unsolvable enigma to whom they were originally dedicated and I have a right to give them poetically only one of the three crore,—that she has been selected by the presiding divinity, then, for some high and holy purpose,—that the appointed hour approaches, and that she must await alone the reverlation of his will

"Then we shall have her solutary in the cave which, are a speech of fears from her, is suddenly and brilliantly illuminated. There will be the smell of perfumes too, and ravishing music, and songs darkly indicating the destiny that awaifs her, and a shower of flowers—rule Manhabert—which will envelop her in wreaths and garlands, and so the scene falls.

"Then we find her on the brow of the steep hill over Kailass-you remember?'

"Yes, the excellent tiffin we had there, after the very bad breakfast in that cold 'Carpenter's Cave?"

"Well, never mind that, because hereafter I have something about that too
We find Ellamah then on the brow of the moon lighted hill, and alone, scarcely alive to her situation beginning to suspect the past and to fear the future. She commences in this strain

> "Why do I feel thus heart stricken? why burns My cheek? Why are mine eyes sulfused with tears? Why shan the stars, and shank to meet the moon?

Have I not done a deed enjoin'd by those Who watch o er mortals, and who d d create ... no water o er mortais, and who d d cres Each for pre-ordain d desting? Why I, Methicks, abould trumph, and should feel Almost celesual from the love divine Of that supernal power!

"Poor" said my companion, curling his lip

"Oh, it is but the sketch, the skeleton," said I, "its colouring may be heightened and finished. Well, to proceed Simahdree joins her, and her coldness—her mystery—her half terrified abstraction, rouse him to deep passion And presently the chief Brahmin appears He rebukes Simabdree

> "How dost thou dare a wake with the rude vo ce, The saints who here inhabit? They who live Forranced in tofinite but that they are All too absorb d to heed thy earthly cries Might wake the th inders of Almighty wrath, To overwhelm thy impious audacity

"Simahdree, not brooking the interruption of the priest, and having, moreover, sundry dark misgivings on the mys terious influence he exercises over Ellamah, replies in indignant anger, and a violent altercation ensues Ellamah, in terror, endeavours to sooth them to peace, but her lover will not hear of submission, and the priest Insists on his humiliation Moro and more confirmed in the horrible suspicions that have been floating in his mind, Simshdree rushes from their presence in distraction, and the scene ends.

"Ellamah then appears alone and holds commune with herself She is now the prey of doubts which are verging on despair, and between my sticism, love, and dawning remorse, her reason reels. In the midst of these and communings Simahdree rushes in, wildly, and with haggard tooks He proclaims aloud his knowledge of the dark strat agems of the priest to effect the rum of his beloved, and his own destruction, and triumphantly recounts his gratified revenge. He has murdered the priest, and the overburdened brain of Ellamah is immediately inflamed to madness She invokes the powers of darkness, and precipitates herself from the rock. The lover, frozen with despair, stands in speechless agony, and the curtain falis "

"A most tragic tragedy, and most laughter moving comedy," sald my friend, sarcasticatty I confess I was piqued. "What Is the matter with tt?" I naked "It is altogether monstrous, strange, and unnatural," replied he, then more moderately and seriously he added. "It will not do for such an age as this, believe me There Is nothing Asiatic there but the scene. Where be your topes and metaphors, your elephant smilles, the staple figure of Indian drama? Your love is European love, and your love is European love, and desses to populate your temples? Go, study Horace, Hayman Wilson's Sansent drama, and the Mahabarat, and a hundred volumes on Hindoo mythology. Ellora is virginground to the muse yet, and such a voice as this is all too weak to awake her echoes. Burn that, however, and now what's next?

"You know the fate of Kishen Kower ?" said I, "now I think of dramatizing her story. I need not tire you with recounting the incidents."

"Especially as there happens to be a tale extant on the same theme, as none has better reason to know than yourself, and auto plagrarisms-" began my friend

"Oh, true " repied I, interrupting him "But then it is allowable to build a drama on the foundations of a tale, you know. And because a subject of historical interest has been multreated one way, there is no reason why if should not be maltreated an another, is there? I have only one or two detached speeches, for the plot is ready laid. And besides, I should so like to consign Ameer Khan to the infamy the wretch deserves, and the tale to which you allude, has made an omission of sill that bears on that strocious murderer Come, do hear this fragment of a dialogue between that Roman Assatic Chand Bhaee, and Kishen Kower! It is towards the catastrophe."

Ha gave such assent as silence conveys, and I began.

CHAND BHATE

And what is death?
It is a aleep in which there are no drennis,
Or, if another life, why not a better?

KISHEN ROWER

What is death! It is this my kinswomma! It is the see the all we know and love, it is the external of every chanty! That gaineds the with flowers. It is to be Reyond or smiles on tears, beyond all know ledges, Beyond or smiles on tears, beyond all know ledges, This gives the condition of the smile with the smile of the smile of the smile of the smile with the smile of the

Why, sunt, to hoary sge, methinks, that this Seeme most abhoriest. And to me, with all My young hopes an me, to me, young in life, Loving the cheerful sun, the fair, fair earth, loving the flowers, the meriest weeds, the sky, The clouds themselves the very loss theometic thing That lives I love I will not do?

CHAND MI ARE

Lay by thy weakness princess for I awest By the red blood that burns within our veins, I blush to hear a daughter of our house Forget the glory of her race for haubles, That each uight a slumber shuts out from her seuses I

MISHER KOWER.

Ay, true i we sleep, and part without a pany From all we love; for in our aculs we know On the next morn the sun shall ruse sgale And we shall feel it? But death's dreadful sleep Wakes nover to such hone

"There, that will do, -now burn it," said my companion

coolly
How angry I was I I confess I had some hopes of completing my drama. Kishen Kower had taken hold strongly of my imagnation However, I compromised between the service of the critic of my own choosing, and my secret sequences on the half of my heroine. I put the electra and

"Non," said I, bringing sundry sheets from the recesses of my portfolio, "here is a paraphrasa of something in the Gulistan No no, scarcely a paraphrase, sooth to say, there is hut the hint of the tale in Saad! However, here is Gladwin's prose, and there is the thought gone mad."

The King weam his hall of state
And his sons before him atood,
And he ponder di much of their future fate,
As he glanced on one with an eya half hate,
And half a mournful mood

Ab, why was the my client sin not the start extend of as he look di upon The unganity form, the stature low The downcat see eye and the phild how, The shade of the statute was there. As ever bless d a father a eye On them from her rich treatury. Notation had not seen the statute was the eye of the start of the start as the start of the start

He raised his eye —that thing half spurn'd—A fire within it blazed and high'd

He make as if his spirit caught The whisper of his father's thought. Scorn me not, father, scorn me not, For that my form is low and mean; Deem not, that Nature all forgot ; She gave, at least, a soul, I ween ! A soul that gasps to win a fame, Bright as of old the mightiest name! Though mountains far more proud and high Look with their summits in the sky.

Alish selected Sivar !-And though the desert oft seem bare Deem'at thou no tiger lurketh there ?"

"Pravely, my first born hast thou spoken!" The king repentant ened ; "Allah the soul to mighty thoughts hath woken, To be thy monarch's pride! Foreive thy father, that he deem'd Thy mind was all thy body seem'd, How much that body hed! Betokening thee mean, low, and weak, Thy spint, like thy bearing, meek, Meetest for saint, but not the gem To star my radiant diadem! Methinks I see thee other now

Than erst thou wert —upon thy brow Stamp'd, sa in fire, thy brave design To prove thee worthy of thy line, Mahammed's lineage and mine i E en now, tny sons, the foe is near. His war note on the blast we hear To-morrow's sun must see us far Beyond the city -Bis M'ALLAH? Foremost on that red battle-field

Rode forth the Prince.—' On, on?' he cries;
'Who follows me, or does, or dies! But if emd this warner band, Trembles one craven heart; Hence !- Let him throw ande his braud. And from our host depart !-Q nck to the batem let bun hie.

In female garb, on couches he As women live, -like coward die !-Cursed be the Chief who flies The harvest field of death !--Thrice bless'd the warner, whose breath Is last drawn here !-midet Hours' eves

He suns hunself in Paradise I The sun is set, the day is done,-The battle bravely, nobly won,-The victor the rejected son !

He bown him at his father a knee. He laya his trophica there . His eye is proud and bold and free Radiant with first felt victory. And sall seems he to dare The onset of the fiercest fray That e'er was done on bottle-day

The monarch kis o'd his brow of pride, And raining placed him by his side. 'Noble the deeds which thou hast done, On von red field my first born son Well they deserve a guerdon fair And as thou knowest to defend the throne. Re as beseems the brth my hear! As thou hast won, so nobly keep thine own!"

"Well," said I, with something of an air of triumph, for this was a finished specimen, " what do you think of that?" "I think little William Evans will be quite equal to its delivery, at the next children's ball his mother assembles for his amusement You had better keep it for him," re plied my friend, calmly I was in great indignation, I threw my pretty poem-for

I do think it is a pretty poem-aside "No more poetry," said I, "perhaps you will be less severe on my prose"

"Perhaps so," said he, "this is an age of inspiration, and trashy verses are a and bore" I turned over the leaves of my diary with great energy;

I felt exceedingly uncomfortable, and pretty much in the condition of a mother who has listened to a satire on her pet child And, indeed, love for a pet poem is the more personal feeling of the two

How meager! what a skeleton was my diary! We look back on years, and see at a glance all the events they have evolved, and exclaim, "What a varied tissue is life!" We look at its daily chronieles, and we cry, "How monotonous I how the hours creep away, leaving no impression to mark their progress " Events are so dovetailed into one another, that we are quite prepared for their occurrence, and when they have passed, the transition seems so natural that we experience no other emotion than satiety or indifference

So with considerably less animation than before, I read from the pages of my Journal

** * * * How ardent and insatiable soever may be one's spirit of inquiry or appetite for novelty, one must of necessity live in the midst of a people the most foreign of any in the world to an Englishman, without the possibility of satisfying either the one or the other, in any adequate degree Just so much of the customs of the Hindus as are brought under cognizance by domestics, or native officials, or the recurrence of religious festivals, are visible, but no more, for their abodes, for the most part, are inaccessible to Europeans Occasionally a native of the higher classes gives a sumptuous entertainment, but then it is quite on the Angle-Indian model, and consequently has no pretensions to be characteristic, or it is a tiger hunt, with its train of elephants, tents, horses, and spearmen, and from its novelties I am excluded

"* * * * Residence in a camp is a life of the most wea risome monotony, malgre the stirring associations con nected with its name Here, it is applied to a force always supposed to be in readiness to march at an hour's notice. which, however, does not prevent those who compose It, from settling themselves in very comfortable habitations Here is none of the pituresque of "the tented field." every . thing is orderly and domestic Nor does the aspect of the surrounding country at all relieve the eternal regularity of the lines of this extensive cantonment. The society, by the very elements of which it is composed, is in the highest degree exclusive, and what is still more hostile to the preservation of unprejudiced intellect, it is the exclusiveness of caste, if I may so speak it is essentially military. Here is no mixture of civilians of any rank or profession, whose ldeas must naturally have an opposite bias, which would be sufficient to demonstrate to the men of blue and scarlet. that there are interests in this wide world quite independent of line stens and standing orders. The most interesting. and indeed the incessant topics of discussion, are the last G O -the apprehended reductions the movements of corns. the iniquities of - and - and -, or a detail of the 'Sayings and Doings' of the last arrival, he or she being, par excellence, the lion of the day * * * * ". . . . The first spectacle that impresses us on our landing in India, is the unaccustomed aspect of our mother earth, we feel that we are indeed in a new world. The form, the foliage, the blossoms, the fruit of the trees, are no longer those which have been our familiar friends from infancy. The flowers are more corgeous and less fragment, the sky itself, in its bright cloudless blue, is foreign to us, and at night it is radiant with a profusion of stars invisible to our northern latitudes. And then the monnlight' such a light for a poet, for an embusiast' so softly brilliant, so purely glowing, so gracefully rounding every object on which it falls.—No, there is nothing here to recall Eng land but by the force of contrast

"But such impressions are naturally weak-ened, perhaps effaced by habit Our moral sense is less sensibly affected in the first instance, but, probably on that account, the more deeply It is to be hoped that in many instances the impression may also be more permanent."

Twaddle!' said my friend, with a very hopeless sigh and shrug

I turned to a new page, and read, in a voice rendered londer by secret indignation at his provoking fastidiousness And between ourselves, gentle reader-1 am sure you are gentle-but revenous & nos moutons

"We no longer breathe the sur of freedom. Where is the socurge for crimes which the law cannot reach? Where is the socurge for crimes which the law cannot reach? Where is the security for the preservation of liberty, independence, character, all that is dearest to man, since power may here wield its thunders unheard but by the victims? for here that guardian from misrule—that champion of our charter,——a free free—is no permitted.

"The natives are neither sold to slavery nor loaded with fetters, but their European conquerors, men of education, of gentle nurture, of high and independent thoughts, and noble sims, endure a slavery of the mind incalculably more

galling

"Free colonization will at least create a public opinion. How a society may exist, and in what state, without this condition, is abundantly illustrated by facts of every day's occurrence on the Indian continent. The action of arit trary power requires to be checked by that wholesome liability to public discussion which recults generally in free dom. There are many tetty tryants, whose oppression. There are many tetty tryants, whose oppression misdeeds would newtably be followed by the exposura from which they are now unfortunately too secure. In this point of view, free colonization should receive the support of every friend to the happiness, the dignity, and, which includes both, the rights of his species?

"Bravo!" said my friend, re-composing himself to his interrupted situmber 'You must really excuse me, I am too modest to pronounce any opinion on these profound questions. I leave you to fight the battles of the colomists, and I unreservedly resign the care of providing us with a free press to MF Bitchingham. I assure you I lind Mill or Jeremy Bentham quite sufficiently sedative towards bed time, without an additional draught. Moreover, is there not a fable,—my classical days are long good by,—but learns and his, wings of wax, what was it? Fram coton

ZATION 17 And his eyes closed, 12 1

I looked on him as some modern Apicius might look, whose guest, at the end of the first course, pronounces the whole affair so execurable that he will tempt it no more — or, as a popular preacher whose congregation deserts him at the end of his "firstly"—or as a lover, whose fair one files just as he bas touched the sublime point of his tender tale

"Thank Heaven! he is not the public!' said I Therefore, rogue la galere' I will print my Sketch book."

FIRST LETTER TO ENGLAND.

My Indian life, my dear friend, has attained the amazing longevity of three months, and ought certainly to afford me materials for a lengthy letter, as P——calls it, to you who have hitherto contemplated Oriental lands through the kaleidoscope of Moore's imagnation. Ab' brilliant and debative visions! what a contrast in the picture before my mind's e.g., when I recall the tractics of Lalla Rookh, and that which impresses itself on the retina as I look to actual existence around me!

I do not think nature meant me for a tourist not sufficiently the powers of attention and abstraction, as the metaphysicians call them, to describe the length and breadth and height of mountains and minarets, palaces and pagodas, tanks and mausoleums besides, you can learn all this from the thousand and one veracious "Travels through Hindostan " "Sketches of -" &c &c &c You must be contented with travelling very rapidly with me, from station to station, pausing just as caprice dictates, without any regard to the route " from the office of the Quartermaster General" I shall never detain you long on the road-no, no, the humours and characters of gracious mankind, developed by the peculiarities of Indian life, are the more interesting objects of speculation, in my judgment at least, that is my forte, and the only chance you have of deriving much amusem int from my corespondence is by indulging me "i' the vein "

"To begin at the beginning, the only comfortable monet of our voyage was list termination. We saw land but once between England and the Luccadives, and that was no more than a faint, way outhine, of somewhat deep er shadow than a cloud, lying upon the horizon at twilight livas Brava, one of the Cape de Verd isles, which was approached for the purpose of ascertaining the longitude. For eighten days we were becaimed on the Line—a delightful variation of the preceding dulness, by still deeper monotiony. Occasionally we passed a ship valling to some other port, and these, indeed, were objects to be remem bered. Proudly and steadyr, as things "instinct with life."

they tracked the smooth sea, or, In rougher water, were exhibited in all varieties of motion, and—may I say?—of attitude, as if agitated by human passion a too apit resemblance of the fearful strifes that war in the breast of man. But such a relief of objects could occupy but a short space of the wearsome length of our days, and we recurred to the delights of the Cuddy society with disguistrather keeper, perhaps, from the change the current of our days had received, and the awakening of remembrances that darkened the present by the force of the contrast.

If you have any interest in some inexperienced adven turer, bound for India, advise him by all means to make his voyage in a ship destined to his own Presidency. The evils of a different plan are, at this moment, very vivid in my mind, for who has so much right to speak strongly as one in whom the bitterness of personal suffering is not yet weakened by time? We embarked on board a vessel bound to Bombay, because it was, by a considera-ble distance, nearer than Madras to the station of our re giment. Consequently, we found ourselves, as we ought to have calculated, amongst people all of whom, having a different desunation—the subjects, so to speak, of a differ ent Government-had no sympathy of hope or expectation with us The improbability of our meeting again was decided, and-mortifying as the assertion is, it is truth-human nature requires some stimulus of self interest for the kindling of its more favourable dispositions. As far as the personal character of the individual, who et once com manded and owned the vessel, affected us, it was unpleasant He had somewhat less refinement than usually characterizes even this class of "floating hotel keepers," and a seat at a table of which he was president, was no very desirable position. He was good natured, however, and obliging, so far as his power extended, but he had too much facility of character to be consistent. His wifewhose tattling propensities rendered her good temper rath er mischievous than beneficial to our society, masmuch as she wandered from one passenger to the other, retailing, for lack of better matter, the likings and dislikings of each -possessed too predominating control to allow me to place her husband in the rank of independent beings But then she unfortunately was quite under the influence of the first mate, a man below even the dignity of caricature, and worthless of a word

Every one thinks it little probable that he should secure a passage for so formidable a voyage under any but an experienced commander The fact is, nothing is more difficult than to ascertain the skill of a person in that position Agents of course have the percentage in view, and never find it advantageous to depreelate the captain of a ressel about to sail when you are seeking a passage any friend can, upon his hanour, recommend a ship ta you, it would be wiser to postpone your voyage a month, or even two, than to consign yourself to a perfect stranger you will, ten to ane, gain the lost time before you make land An unskilful commander must be very extensively in the power of his first officer, and if the passengers are accessible, the chance is that the young man is engrossed by social pleasures, when your real advantage requires his alertness and vigilance in the navigation of the ship. Moreover, if he be presuming his airs of consequence may be rather more disagreeable than any thing but experience ean Imagine In the first case, you are carried aut to a longitude that gives you a telescopic view of the Brazils, and in the second you have either to endure the annoy ance of low bred familiarity and vulgar companionship, or, admitting your reserve, of insolent defiance and netty vindictiveness—just those gnat like stings for which one never seeks the aid of ' the leech," but which may be repeated until "the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint."

You will imagine we could hardly be five long months "ploughing the weary waste of waters," without seeing some of the wonders of the mighty deep It is, indeed, af together and wholly a wonder in its calmness so beautiful -in its turbulence so a wfully magnificent 1 But to By ron, "the laureate of the sen," as somebody calls him. I refer you for pictures worthy of the subject, I will only give you occasional sketches of my own feelings, amongst the thou sand poetical fancies that crowded upon the mind when the moon was high up in the heavens-the whole hemisphere unsullied by a cloud-the stars walking along in their brightness, and the hourd warld around one Immense sheet of glass, unrippled by a breeze-its swelling subsided into a death like seremity, reflecting back the beautiful arch above it-its surface shining in the broad beams of the "full round moon," then, without speaking we know that each shared the thought of the ather, and that our hearts had gone homewards We were in tears, gentle, and springing rather from the "jay of grief" than its pain pelieve we both felt how much we had satrificed, but in the same instant were coasaled by the perhaps selfish con viction—we love!

With all my moral courage, which you fancy abundant, I suspect I am as great a physical cow ard as exists. You will scarcely suppose that we weathered a five months' soyage without a storm, and my agony during its contin

2

nance was so utterly beyond description, that I shall leave it to your imagination After a monotonous calm of long continuance, I think the male part of our society were pos-itively exhibirated by the bustle, the occupation, necessary to secure the ship's safety The idlers even chose to remain on deck, and enjoyed the dashing of the waves over at and them And oh! the terrific voice of those waves. as it seemed to threaten destruction to the rash pigmies who had dared to invade the boundless empire of the deen! Even now, as I recall the sensations of those hours a shuddering chiliness creeps over my heart, and I feel as if no hope on earth could tempt me again to incur it As soon, however, as the storm had subsided, when a breeze filled our sails, wafting us cheerfully towards the desired haven of our destination, there were sounds of murth and exhibitation on all sides. All the ridiculous of the preceding day pressed on the mind in vivid colours, and with renewed force One enumerated the falls he had received -another the injury his cabin furniture had sustained-a third betraved the fears of his companion, and a fourth described the mathematical figures into which sundry dishes had been agitated, with somewhat more rapidity than suits the decorum of a well ordered dinner We went on, day after day, gayly before the wind, resuming our usual occupations-desultory reading, yawning, eating, sleeping, dancing, playing cards One determined scribe kept a diary It is still a wonder to me how he contrived to fill it-with "tales of a straw" somebody said. He was a man of very minute mind—about forty, I conjecture— very ignorant, but his head being filled with the "exurie" of literature, gathered from third rate reviews, and fifthrate bookscliers, book-clubs, and reading societies, he had formed a very comfortable estimate of his own powers He was indeed quite a curiosity in his way, with his gentle self flattery, his lisping enunciations of the most outre plati tudes, his talent for singing in a small way, and the out rageous blunders which invariably attended his little lite rary affectations He was very harmless, and amused us occasionally, but we became dreadfully tired before the voyage was fairly over, we had heard his round of anecdotes at least a dozen times, and the repetition rendered them "flat, stale, and unprofitable," d merveille I was very sorry to be obliged to confess him a bore, for whilst one could afford the most languad smile, his exhibitions really answered very well on board

I must not forget to enumerate amongst "the spots of the azure on the cloudy sky" of our voyage, the usual diversities of fishing for sharks, dolphins, Portuguese men of war, and the shooting at " Mother Carev's Chickens," and the Atparenss Does not that last name recall to you at once the whole story of the "Ancient Mariner ?" When I saw one of these enormous birds on the deck, covered with blood. I could not repress a superstitious feeling that the successful marksman was a doomed man. Far different thoughts, however, shone in his countenance It expressed unmingled triumph, and a consciousness that he had achieved a deed of fame and prowess. It is really amusing to observe daily, from how many and diversified sources the vanity of man extracts aliment to sustain and invigo rate Itself This youth looked down, as 1f from an unap proachable altitude, on those less fortunate of his companions, whose trophies consisted only of chickens, flying fish, or even of dolphins. He had done n deed which so far outshone them all 1.

Nothing can be more beautiful than, looking over the ship's side, to watch the dolphins, apparently just beneath the surface of the water, displaying their beautiful thats in a thousand gambols. I wonder what kind of a dolphin that was which conveyed Arion from his covetous crew. If we had been in a similar predicament, I fear our murder must have been completed, how doubt soever the fish might have been. Their size would have been in most unsatisfactory evidence of their power's inding their will. I confess the beautiful verses of Byron—

With a new uni
The dolphin, whom each pang imbues
With a new uni
The last, still lovehest, till 'tis done, and all is gray"

—tempted me on drck to witness the expiring stringles of one. The varying units were beautiful, and the last deathhue just like that gray twilight which always seems to me the atmosphere of death. But the blood that was around, produced sensations which convinced me that I am not born to be a connoisseor in these matters

Imagine my delight on being awakened at sunrise, and carried almost forcible to the windows of my cabin to carried almost forcibly to the windows of my cabin, to view what surely appeared to me the most enchanting spectacie this cartic could firmlish. Land was in sight—lay apparently all around us—and such a land! Magnicent mountains stretching up into the clouds, with every variety ofform and colour—rocks—fungle covered, and some clad more nobly with lordly forests. Gos could be indistinctly seen, and its very name awakened recollections that seemed to swell an a moment to a whole history. The water, so darkly blue, was just sufficiently in motion to give one that idea of life and activity most consonant to the "morning's prime," when the spirit of man seems to harmonize with the hopefulness and brightness of the young day Small boats, manned of course by natives-the eraft so new to us in their shape, and the sallors in their aspect and apparel-were coasting, apparently, from village to village, whilst a few more adventurers approached our vessel with fish, cocoa-nuts, and vegetables 'The whole scene was a panorama clothed in that vivid bue which is peculiar to an Eastern atmosphere I was almost overwhelmed with delight, and an eager and impatient joy to press again my mother earth, to mingle again in the haunts of human life, to explore new scenes, and to be an actor in adventures, which I immediately, in happy Ignorance, began to picture as most accordant to the prospects before mc. In the whole of my past life I cannot recall a moment correspondent to this in the dilation of heart, the revival of energy, the consciousness borne upon me that new and higher powers were to be developed and applied to nobler pur-Yes I that moment was full of a bright and deep Doscs happiness

Like all earthly things, even a long voyage, eternal as one is disposed to consider it, must terminate I imagine, then, all our perils by sea fairly over, and behold us as cending the bunder at the third of the indian presidencies

The harbour of Bombay has been so often described, that one might as well think of gratifying the currosity of an Englishman by a picture of that of Portsmouth, which, however, this is said to resemble very closely. The object which, on our coming to an anehor, most foreity or reveted my attention, was the tower of the distant church, an object full of sweet and hely associations to any of an object full of sweet and hely associations to any of the public form. There is nothing remarkable in any of the public form of the manchorage! barracks and public offices having a strong family likeness everywhere.

Bombay, to speak statistically, is a-floorilabing and im proving city, most advantageously situated as a port for commerce, with a fine and secure harbour, it is gradually becoming the emporime of merchandles from the East and from the West. Varions public edifices are in progress to adorn the Fort, as it is called, the suburbs are covered with bungalows, possessing every advantage of situation; the soil is rich, whilst topes of trees in every direction diversify and adorn the landscape. The newly arrived traveller is constantly amosed with the various groups of Hudoos, Chinese, Persans Arabs, Parsees, Luscars, and British sailors, that are hurrying of saungering through the streets of the fort Every moment his attention is arrested by an object of novelty Palanquins, backeries, bandies, buggies, pass in succession before him, as strange to his unaccustomed eve in their appearance as the human beings to whose convenience they are appropriated

20

Amongst the most respectable of these pedestrians, he distinguishes a class habited in clean and nest costume. whom he soon learns to denominate Parsecs Of appearance more athletic and stouter, and in complexion fairer than the Hindoos, they are also characterized by that air of occupation which marks the thriving tradesman and the wealthy merchant. They wear a coloured turban of a chintz nattern, with a peaked, perpendicular crown, without folds, their tacket is white, reaching down to the knees, and their drawers of the same material, rather loose, extend below the calf A great part of the traffic of Bombay is in their hands, and In their independent habits they seem to me to bear the same relation to the remaining nonulation, as the Quakers to that of England Their females wear an oriental drapery, frequently of crimson silk, with a broad purple border, forming in one plece, the head covering, and the outer garment of the body. They are constantly visible, carrying huge vessels of water on their beads, from the adjacent wells, recalling all the scriptural histories of Rebelah and the princesses of Israel. Under these burdens their gait is erect and graceful, and their step firm Their ankles are uncovered, but their feet are clothed in a slipper with no hind quarters, but pointed in front, the extremity turning up in that manner which is recorded as a prevailing fashion in the reign of Richard the Second, whilst the Mussulmauns, on the contrary, have the extremity of the shipper broad and square, with a much smaller peak, the material of both is morocco, of various colours, embroidered The Parsee women are tall and finely formed, their faces oval, their features good, and their countenances expressive The Parsees (originally fugitives from Persia) retain their ancient worship, and are Ghebers Every morning, at the rising of the sun, they had him with their homage, and in the evening they watch his retiring with the same devout observance At the latter season, when, for the benefit of the sea breeze, I have been carried to the beach, I have observed on the shore innumerable Parsees, each individual at a distance from the other, breathing his audible prayers to the luminary, whose last rays yet lay on the waters Many have prayer books, and all frequently bow their foreheads to the earth, in oriental salams Few, however, were so engrossed by their devotions as not to cast a stray glance on passengers

The houses of the wealthy Parsees are large, and abound in Venetians. Some of the chef of them occasionally give simpliciants. Some of the chef of them occasionally give simpliciants are supported by the English style, and no person, however elevated his rank may be, declines the invitation. At sunset, a lamp is always lighted at the door of perry midwidual of this sect, which burns until the sun has risen. Considering fire as a scred element, they are careful never to extinguish a light by breathing on it, although your servant will compromise between his convenience and his conscience, by waving it to and from until some friendly gale shall accomplish his purpose

The native women of this part of India are not distinguished for their beauty. They are generally short, stout, broad faced, and flat featured. I saw, indeed, a few pleasing exceptions, amongst whom I particularly remarked one young grif, of dark-ohive complexion, Grecian features, and as sweet an expression of countenance as I ever member to have seen, notwithstanding the bad effect of the large nose ring which she wore

One of the most painful objects I winessed, was a leper, Amongst his dusky countrymen he wandered as a being on whom a visible curse has fallen, the skin of his whole body exhibiting an unvaried his of scrofillous like pink Amongst Europeans, his disease would have been less remarkable, but so totally distinct from his dark Astatio brethren, he seemed, indeed, an outcast, rejected by country the country of t

try, home, and lineage

Though accustomed to the various sounds that fill the streets of London, every stranger must be sensibly affected on his first arrival at Bombay, by the extreme and uncut noises and violent gestoculation with which the natives are accustomed publicly to express their anger with each other One is in momentary apprehension that the result will be blows; and no Englishman, so excited, would ever think of settling the dispute in any other method. Amongst the Hindoos, however, this rarely occurs. Abuse, of the grossest and most virulent description, they will lavish on their opponents, but pugalism seems, for the most part, to be beyond the scope of their passions.

The society here is divided into several parties, amongst which it is impossible to preserve your neutrality, because the mere fact of your being seen at Mrs. S's house, will exclude you from the entertainments of Mrs. G's. At the present period, these petty divisions had acquired magnitude and Importance, by the dissensible between the governor and the chief justice. It is foreign to my purpose to discuss the ments of this question, or to intrench on the prerogative of newspapers or other public journals. Popular feeling seems to be in favour of the judge; but you will have received, long before this time, ample documents from which you will form a judgment more correct than mine, which is likely to be influenced by personal feelings and prejudices.

After a month's residence, then, we quitted this presidency for a march through the Deccan, which offers a favourable crisis for the conclusion of a very long letter.

A TOUR OF VISITS.

In was about eleven o'clock on one of those fine sunny mornings, for which India is more netorious than admired, that, descending the steps of my verandah, I entered my palanquin, with the benevolent purpose of "bestowing my dulliness" on as many of my neighbours as were disposed to admit me

"Erskine, Sahib," said I, and forthwith the vehicle was nut in motion

The sun poured a broadside on my left, for which to close the donor was the palpable remedy, but on the other side, as I to make the amende homorable, a cool breeze (it was December, and my place of location on this habitable globe was latitude 22° north) blew freshly on my check, so I took comfort and my book together

People always read in a palanquin, if they are fortunate enough to get hold of the supplying material, and if they are so happy as to be permitted by persons who are more influential than might at first sight be imagined

Onwards ran the bearers, up and down, and on this side and that side, like a wirating scale, very nearly, but not quite balanced, pendulated my carriage, and the words of my book seemed to fall to pieces before my eyes, and the letters jumped about in all the confusion of a country-dance when the performers are out. In despar I closed it, and in the next minute enjoyed the relief of being deposited safely at the door of Capitan Ersking.

ed salely at the door of Captain Erskine
"H, Sahb," were the welcome words of the servant in waiting, being equivalent to the English "at home," agreeable or not as the case may be

At a morning call you may very often find a majority of the single young men of the station assembled, so that you may call the meeting matinee, as distinguished from the sorreet, to a place at which so far as my experience goes, only the fortunate married are eligible, except by formal invitation

In this case there were four or five gathered together, whom I found in the midst of an argument on the merits of a certain obnoxious paragraph in G. O emanating from the commander in-chief, who dealt with the feelings of officers as mercifully as he did with the English language, cutting up both without scruple, and luxuriating most in his effusions up proportion as en morale and en litterature they,

advanced daringly hors de regles

My epirance afforded a seasonable Interruption, and the lady of the mansion extended to me a reception of flatter ing kindness. She was evidently fired of the interminable changes rung on the everlasting theme of General Orders, inasmuch as she had no interest in the matter, Captain Brakine being in the service of a nable prince, nominally independent, whose troops were officered by Europeans, not all in the service of the King or the Company, and who consequently were regarded by the magnates of the service, much as the regulars at home estimate the militia

Mrs Erskine was a beauty in duodecimo, and entitled to be rather more foolish and ill tempered than one would have thought desirable in a plainer woman

"So. Purbeck, of yours, is going to be married at last?".

began the lady

"Such is the report," replied I, "but if this be not the region of imagination, it is of invention, and I hesitate to believe any thing that is wasted to us on the current of a mere on dit"

Oh' but this is from the best authority. I had it from Mrs Paulet the lady's ester Purbeck and she were compagnous decoyage, you know, and there is no way of killing the tedium of long 'trivel by water,' like love making."

"You are exquisitely correct, my dear Mrs Erskine," said Mulgrave a joing subaltern on leave, I existed through the horrors of a five month's passage solely by adhering to that prescription. My noble ambition of being esteemed the best conductor of a flirtition in ladir early dawned within me, and our first roll us the Bay of Biscay witnessed the practical application of the sublishe theory. I had conceived. How it lared with me, sub-sitenic set,—pardon me it is oracular to speak in an unknown tongue And so Purbeck has positively worked himself up to mat rimony! having an eye, I presume, to the connexion with the adjuttant general's office."

'A fair speculation," said Major Lumley, "and a sure means of passing through company duty with as few drills as the oldest woman in the service could desire"

"But what could possess the grd?" resumed Mulgrave.
"The man is such a thorough petrafection—an automaton, whose springs carry him at given hours to the parade, through the routine à la Torrens, and that is the essence and soul of his being Beyond that nartial book, and the chronology of the general orders, his head is guiltless of a single idea "

"Oh, you wrong him," returned the major, "I assure you that Captain Purpeck is never blind to the most remote contingency that can possibly affect the interests of-Captaın Purbeck "

"Do not be scandalous," drawled Mrs Erskine, "I never patronise abuse I do not think Purbeck so very bad, a little cold, perhaps"

"Oh, most chillingly so, my dear Mrs Erskine," interrupted Mulgrave "his monosyllabic orations are distilled from him like drops of rose water passing in minute time -one-two-three-through the alembic Who ever saw his cheek kindle for an instant either in hope or anger? Who ever saw his eye lighten as if it were indeed a window into the soul within? His complexion is always frosty, -his eye forever icy I caught cold during the hot winds through a visit from him the thermometer fell forty de grees on his entering the hall, and the instantaneous tran sition from over heat to shivering point was too much for my constitution I have heard that at home, being overtaken by a snow-storm, the snow flakes in the congenial atmosphere of his face remained adhesive in all their mag nitude, for he had not animal heat enough to melt them?"

"That should be one of the colonel's own," said the ma jor dryly, who, not having a grain of imagination himself. invariably classed warmth of descriptive colouring with that vice of the mind which the vulgar call falsehood

"Unless you would see me expire in convulsions, major. conjure not up that dark horror I heard that Mrs Wilby fainted two nights since with terror at the magnitude of his Munchausens," replied Mulgrave, with an expressive shrug-"What upon earth placed that man at the head of a force? It is an enormity sufficient to afford matter of memorial to the honourable court People at home have no idea how matters are managed here "

"As everywhere by interest," replieding major "It ought to be by policy, rather," said Mulgrave frontier station on the borders of a foreign territory is a door worth keeping locked by strong springs, and to put such a warder over if 'a man who has neither head to direct, nor hand to execute "

"Nor bull headedness enough to compensate for his deficiency in mental vigour He is over flexible to the touch of his native butler," said the major

"Ah, if it were permitted, 'I could a tale unfold,' of a man who, without common sense, truth, honour, or honestv. military skill, or-tell it not in Gath !-military courage, solely from his relationship to a man in office, is kept in an important position, in which he can only injure the government he serves, and rum, perhaps the officers who have the misfortune to serve under him."

"You and the weather are getting warm, Mr Mulgrave Pull the punkah, you Bhou" said Mrs Erskine, rather enjoying the bitterness of the young man

"Oh for a free press" said Mulgrave, ' that alone con-military "

"But unattainable without free colonization, I suspect," said the major, whose mind oscillated between his desire for a better system of things, and his adherence to those peculiar privileges belonging to the members of that serrice, in which the greater part of his like had been spent.

As the conversation veered to politics, and threatened severer discussion than I thought compatible with the good of my constitution, whilst the thermometer stond at 90 deg, in the shade, I made my how, and re-entered my palanoun

I fell into a revery, as I lay listlessly, half raised by pillows, naturally suggested by the discussion I had heard on the merits of Colonel - The truth of the assertion. that interest only was the procuring cause of his appoint ment, could not be contravened, but, I asked myself, as I surveyed nearly all the higher military appointments in India, where is there a single example of its being otherwise? Of the governor we hear little, he is a good, peaceable man, who will need no area columna to perpetuate his deeds, these "piping times of peace" are not favourable to the celebrity of men in office in a country legislated for at a distance of twelve thousand miles He has a score of kinsmen to engross his patronage, and he seems laudably to occupy himself in culling its choicest flowers for their appropriation How, then, shall the still small voice of ment be heard in the bustle of the claimants who surround him? The ties of blood, or propingintly, or obligation, must naturally supersede the far inferior rights which an unconnected individual may fancy be derives from extent or period of service. "Interest interest interest in a the three indispensable qualifications, without which let no man hope for one tota more than the regulations absolutely secure to him Nor does the immediate head of our department deviate by "the twentieth part of one poor degree" from the prac tice of his contemporary "Interest is qualification," is his axiom, and not one action of his can be produced, in proof that its application is not universal. He has other peculiar prejudices also which exhibit him in a phase not exceed ingly admired by this army at large. He is not suspected of any undue partiality to Company's Officers, indeed, his con trary prepossessions have sometimes been so manifest as to excite universal indignation in parties who take the free dom to fancy themselves mured. The perseverance of a refractory court martial, in a sentence not "approved and confirmed," elicited a threat of a new organization of the army at the approaching crisis What heart burnings! what mutinous excitement there was amongst us! In what court, civil or military, would so tyrannio an interference with its conscientious judgment be permitted? Adieu to the boasted trial by jury, if the judge is to menace with punishment an enlightened jury, who honestly, and to the best of their knowledge, decide on evidence submitted to them The trumpet tongued press of all Britain would awake, to defend the sacred right of free judgment, ac cording to a man's conscience But here that tongue is silent, as if there were, indeed one tract of British ground where Britons are no longer free men, as if the grave of an Englishman's liberty had indeed been found here

My reflections had just reached this point, when their bitterness was seasonably interrupted by the sound of an approaching bandy, which slackened its pace as it came aloneside

"Is that you, K—?" askell a volce which I recognised as belonging to Wartnaby," a young heutenant; but who was pardoned by spinsfers the six of subalternship, namuch as he was in't be Commissariat, the only brain of the service in which, in these days, a man has any chance of accumulating

"Are you going to Cameron's?" he continued, when I had assured him of my identity, "come, get into my bandy, and send away your bearers, I will drive you there in less than ten minutes"

I gladly accepted us offer, and we were presently rolling along, with a speed that promised to realize his assertion

"Well, Wartnaby," said I, "you are going to look at the spinster in pretty considerable haste this augurs well for your matrimonial inclinations"

"It is a 'lying divination,' then," said he, laughing, "I have vowed a vow against all manner of love making and match making, with any girl, of what kind soever whom any possible combination of circumstances can have brought to the Indian market."

'It were well that were said quietly," I replied, "such a declaration would draw on you the wrath of three-fourths of the female part of the cantonment."

"Of course, because three fourths of them are precisely in that predicament No imperimence of mine can induce them to cut me, state never touled harder to propriete tyrant, than I to become hated of them What a misfortune, K—, that a man should be naturally so preposessing as to reoder his making the disagreeable a moral impossibility."

"Coxcomb' if thou wert other than the best fellow in the world, thou wouldst be past endurance"

"That is proof experimental of the truth of my asser tion," said he, laughing "Who can dishke Ned Wartna by kind Ned Wartnaby 1 honest Ned Wartnaby! good Ned Wartnaby! Not even Mrs Paul, who bates all the world besides"

"I thought you really had effected a cut there "

"By no manner of meaos I have refused at least nine million invitations but her last chit threatened me with a call from herself if I absolutely declined, and I was com pelled to show myself there last night. I did the honours of my impertinence in the finest possible style She had the assurance to mention as opprobrious, that the divine Mrs Markham is the daughter of a tradesman I mildly ventured to moure, if she were aware that sundry of our English peeresses were in the same predicament persisted with true half-caste impenetrability, and I really felt myself compelled to say- Can you, Mrs Paul, kindly add a much more important piece of information, inasmuch as the circumstances may have been influential in the early nurture of the lady-who was her mother?" The animal with the greatest sang-froid, protested ignorance, and I really believe felt as little affected as if she had been made of wood or stone "

"For a man of liberal ideas, your prejudice against this race of unfortunates, are more than reasonably strong"

work the cause of my berality The class is so unnatur ally bad that their moral aspect must be the result of a political error, which I would wish to be removed for their amendment But perhaps If I would open up some aven ues to their advancement in society, I would close others Look at the immense distance there is between the posi tion of the male and female portions of these people Should these things be? Is there cause to sanction such disagree ment? Are the one better educated than the other? Are their earliest ideas more carefully cultivated? Is the young female plant less hable to be warped by the ungenial influ ence of-unhappy fact 1-a mother? Look at the history -the daily lives of too many officers of this army, for the melancholy answer, and believe that a well born and well educated Englishman may be denaturalized by an unhappy marriage with an Eurasian, if it be their pleasure so to call themselves Allons done in and we alighted at the door of Captain Cameron

We found him on a couch, before which a sofa table was placed The room was impregnated with aroma purely Indian, the odour of the hookah, from which he was inha ling oriental luxury On the table was a glass vase containing a bouquet of oleanders tuberoses, the aplendid Rosa mutabilis, Indian stock, and peacock's pride, the rich colours of which were relieved only by half a dozen green leaves, decidedly indicating the taste of native servants, who carefully abstract the leaves from the flowers they cull for this purpose A glass dessert dish was half filled with water, the surface of which was covered with roses in close juxtaposition literally decapitated the stems being absent on leave, another native taste. Their delightful perfume was perceptible, notwithstanding the neighbourhood of the hookah sweet in themselves, and the more a reet for their associations with all one remembers of dearest, purest, and best at home In this part of the world hat are called in England monthly roses are common of high in gardens, but they are without the least perfume whose which were at this moment delighting me, are much rarer

Two tea cups half full of cold tea, proved how harmless was the beverage which formed the accompaniment to Captain Cameron's hookah.

Line-steps and general orders were discussed as usual with the emphasis of personal feeling Letters from home and newspapers Buckingham and the renewal of the charter, were severally communicated and commented on In teresting as each and all of these topics might be, our eyes wandered towards the doors with that restless impatience of curlosity, allowable in two individuals in whose life the sight of a new female face, the possessor being unmarried, was like angel's visits, "few and far between '

"Don't be in a burry, K.—, wait a little, Wartnaby," said Captain Cameron, with characteristic delicacy, "You shall have a sight of my young lady in time. Why, Wart naby, man," addressing hinself more particularly to my friend, who, I have broady binted, is in the commissariat, "you have resolved to marry at last, I hear. Don't take an old standard in the country, my boy, they never wear well, they wear out though," enjoying his execrable at tempt at a pun. "Hear, you boy" calling with the voice of a stentor, "go tell mistress two gentlemens here."

The domestic presently returned

"Mistress too much busy, S-a a r, mistress not come," said he

"Why not come? why too busy? what you tell mistress?? asked Cameron angrily, falling into the colloquial English of the natures, which one does habitually, as being more intelligible to them

"I fell mistress, 'Master tell come, mam, two genle men here,' then mam ask, 'What gentlemen" 'I not know,' I tell, then mistress too much angry, and say,— 'Go, go' I too much busy, I not come' And therefore I tell mister"

"Go away, go nway, you're a fool " u conclusive way of answering n mal a propos truth "The fellow has made some mistake, 1 ll go myself"

And he entered his lady's sanctuary forthwith, which not being within ear shot of the hall, we lost the benefit of their

tête d tele

"Wash head day, my diamond to a ducal," said Wart naby solto roce, which purely Indian phrase is very much to use amongst ladies country born and country-educated, and, I fear, even prevails amongst English women who have lived so long here as to forget the better usages of home. It needs scarcely be explained as meaning, that the lady is engaged in one of those ablutions so frequent and as grateful in this climate.

Whatever might be the reasons urged, or the entreaties or commands used on this occasion by Captain Cameron, they had ended in his total defeat—not an unfrequent result in matrimonial conflicts, I believe, whether performed in the East or the West

"She is not well—that is, Mrs Cameron is not well and Lucy is with ber," said he, sulkily instituting the bad success of his mission. It is astonishing how much moral courage it requires to enable a husband to confess the undirinfied fact—"My wife will not come!"

We chatted a few minntes, but Cameron's temper was evidently disordered, and Wartnaby started off double

ouick

"That is one of the punishments a man suffers for the sin of such a marriage," sald he, as soon as the vehicle was in motion "These Indian women are never fit to be seen before the evening drive, or, if earlier, at a tiffin narty "

"Disappointment, as usual, renders you bitter," said I, "that is a classification Mrs Cameron would not forgive

She is an Armenian "

"Oh yes, so are they all, all-all of them Armenians" Was ever man so changed from gentleman to barbarian as yonder Cameron since his marriage?'

"The man had always capabilities for the character, you wıll allow" "Well, if I were an influential man in Saint Stephen's, I would assuredly add a clause to the divorce-bill, for the benefit of men in Cameron's unhappy predicament. would make a woman's causing herself to be denied more than ten times in every month, a sufficient ground for granting a prayed for divorce, without alleging one other cause of complaint"

"This unusual bitterness is surely indicative of some pressentiment of the future influence of the fair Lucy-Lucy !"

"I detest the name-Lucy-Louisa-Tarza bi tarza, nou be nou pe sang he, perhaps as the most effectual way of causing his spleen to evaporate At Mrs Marley's, where we next alighted, we found a large party sitting in committee on the merits of the lady, whose invisibility had so unfortunately disqualified us from being enrolled as members

The usual questions and answers hating been recipro cated, the discussion proceeded "My dear Mrs Marley, I quite disagree with you, her complexion really is not so good as you imagine," said Mrs Lieutenant Clinby, with ber usual minced Irish, "it will not last, I assure you, pink whites never do, blue white is the only good complexion for this climate

"Exactly," said Wartnaby, with a bow, making the palpable application

"But such a foot" said the diminutive Mrs Captain Harris, "I saw it with the heel out of the shoe, looking as if it were afflicted with elephantiasis"

"She has a large hand and foot, I allow," said Captain Prody, "sile as a fine woman, nevertheless, and very like Miss O'Neill, such as I remember her, at the time of her debut, when I was a young man about town"

Cantain Proby left England atatis sixteen, and had lived the subsequent twenty five years in India. He was one of that class who, in the fond imagination of having outlived the remembrance of their origin, assume the airs of men of family, and talk of their convexions with the decisive air of people who are secure against contradiction. He piqued himself on the accuracy of his toilet and the unexcentionable elegance of his manners, which he believed to be perfectly in keeping with the best ton of the age was suspected that they were formed on the model Ches terfield recommended, engrafted on the propriety of a Grandison, with a sprinking of Indian peculiarities which no talent can escape, after so long an abode in this climate He read much-all the new novels, pamphlets, and sketch es of society within his reach, and he adopted the style and sentiments of the literary favourite of the day-usque ad bleram. You always knew what work had had the benefit of his last perusal, for he delivered its opinions ver batim, with the accurate simplicity of a parrot Trifles naturally float on the surface, from which, by the way, it is by no means to be inferred that the depths contain any thing to prove that nature abbors a vacuum Captain Pro by abounded in anecdote, and was amusing during at least his two first visits beyond these his intimates charged him with repeating himself, and affected to know the precise chord which would produce the sound required, the Ley note, the sounding of which would awaken any instru ment of the whole orchestra. He was a great critic on female beauty, manner, and accomplishment-given to scandal and tea parties-decisive in detecting indications of talent, or of the want of it, and philosophically skeptical of any that extended beyond the very circumscribed range of his own ideas. He gave magnificent entertalnmentsexhibited services of plate, quite en prince, piqued himself on bowing like George the Fourth, and was, like all others who have just sipped "the Pierian spring" a coxcomb in the knick knackeries of literature-a pedant in manner, by too great anxiety after the perfection of elegant case-a man who played his small character in life with great verbosity and overmuch gesticulation, delivering the meanest and simplest ideas with a pompous periphrasis, that reminded one too often of the flourish of trumpets, and enter Tom Thumb

"Like Miss O Neill in almost screamed Mrs Slater, who was lately from Europe "My dear Captain Proby, what an antediluvian idea! Miss O'Neill is quite forgotten, I as sure you" "A waif upon the stream of time," sald Captain Proby, with his usual felicity of application, and complacent sen timentality

"One might as well forget that nobody reads Miss Edge worth," continued Mrs Stater, who, being lately imported, insisted on giving the ton in literature, as well as dress and style

"How impossible" said Wartnaby, affectedly, "just as if we, the devotees of Vivian Grey, Almack's, et hoc genus omne, could possibly endure books which come recom mended only by sound sense, a perfect style, exquisite discrimination, cultivated taste, extensive and accurate obser vation, and the applause of all the literary world of Eu rope, for nearly half a century I assure you, Miss Edgeworth may be considered quite exploded, and Miss O'Neill as forgotten as if

' Fate had fast bound her With Siys nine times round her '"

"The sticks that forget her, I suppose," said Colonel Hornley, laughing convulsively at his own execrable pun "I do not admire Miss Edgeworth," and Captain Proby, with his emphatic tone of criticism, "she is too much of a blue stocking, and too little of a wit."

He paused, and seemed to feed with mental delight on the felicitous introduction of so brilliant an antithesis

"I do so hate blue-stockings," said little Mrs Harris, with a pointed glance at Mrs Stater

'The term and the character, I thought, were quite anti quated, even in this outer settlement of semi civilization," returned Mrs Slater, with the same amiable personality "I believe you will find females in general something lite rary now, at home, fifteen years must naturally afford time for great advancement in an age distinguished for the march of intellect."

Mrs Harris coloured, bit her lip, and tossed her head Just fifteen years since she had commenced her Indian career, and so palpable an allusion could not be evaded

Mrs Clinby, who by no means approved this interruption of the attack on a new arrival of suspicious beauty, took advantage of the momentary pause, to renew it "Well, I must say, I think Miss Cameron's figure very overgrown and masculae," she began "She must be at least five feet eight, how monstrous for a female! I do not think her at all a good life for this chimate"

"Her wisdom will be then to marry some retiring colo nel, and return home forthwith," said Wartnaby, who held Mrs Chinby in abommation, and threw out the suggestion for the charitable purpose of discomposing her

"Colonels are not so attainable now a days," returned the lady, who reciprocated Wartnaby's dislike with great corduality, "they who think of going home, are wise enough to await the end of their voyage, and to marry when they can know what they are about"

"Such knowledge is more easy of acquirement here, I should apprehend—I speak olways under correction—than in the midst of that variety England offers, to waylay and tempt him at every step," rephed Warthaby, who was all ways reluciant to leave a lady in the quiet enjoyment of the sex's high prerogative—the last word "To be sure, men marry ill everywhere, and as the chances are ten to one in favour of his being taken in, I advise, for Miss Cameron's sake, that this identical colonel, we and the fates in tend to procure for her, should make his best bow in stanter"

"I wonder who she was," resumed Mrs Clinby, shifting her point of attack, for she was remarkable for hunting down every sufferer she started, "I never heard of the Camerons being connected with anybody in the least re spectable And what a woman is Mrs Cameron, to produce her! I absolutely expre whenever she enters my doors"

'Ah, but one does die so often in this unbappy clime'' responded Wartnaby, with an affectation as similar to the lady's as a moderate and skilful caricature can be to the original, "and then one recovers so quickly and so en original, "and then one recovers so quickly and so en tirely—making at worst only just an Irish 'being kill' of it' Mrs. Climby tossed her head, and talked from Wartnaby

"Girls are so soon spoiled after their arrival in this country's he said to Captain Proby, "you flatterers completely turn their heads they forget every thing about home except the finery to be procured there, and imagine them-actives people of great attractiveness and beauty, merely because they are not unnoticed"

There was a smile, a general and expressive smile, on the countenances of that circle it was so extraordinary, they thought, that Mrs. Clinby should so far saturze her self the had emerged at once from the depths of "rustical obscurity" into the theater of an Indian presidency, she had all the advantage of that pore English complexion for which our island country women are so famous, and she had fine light hair and bright blue eyes, which, if they were not over much lighted by expression, were still blue and bright, and she had a tall, slender figure, and a prettlly turned foot and ankle, and easy manners—that ease which does not result from acquaintance with the habits of elegant society, but from a happy unconsciousness of deficiency, and she danced tolerably, and sang a little-had a new wordrobe and dressed well and finally after six days' courtship, married Lieutenant Clinby, to the great scandal of all those whose propriety had sustained a siege of as many weeks No transformation ever was so complete it seemed as if one soul had transmigrated from her body and a second had replaced it the whole "hue and colour" of the charac ter were different | Impressed with a great idea of the im portance she derived from her connexion with the nephew of an earl she "fooled at to the top of her bent," to the amusement of one half of her acquaintance, and the dis gust of the other she continually drew on herself disa greeable reflections by consequential assumptions, and she put the whole world on discovering points from which she might be attacked to advantage, merely because she had the folly to hoist flying colours from every angle and bas tion of the fortress Perhaps no vice, however enormous, so surrounds a human being with enemies as egregious vanity, because it continually wounds our neighbour's self love

Tired of the discussion, I made a signal to Wartnaby,

and we withdrew

Indian society is indeed but a miserable exchange for the social enjoyments of England In the out stations, the proportion of females to the other sex may be as one to fif teen, or as one to twenty. This alone contains a sufficient cause of the generally uncultivated manners and exterior of the majority of the young men, yet even these, few as they are, and sometimes objectionable are rarely united by any bonds of sympathy or attachment. So far distant from home, almost exiles in a foreign land, a theorist would imagine that these circumstates alone would be sufficient to form strong links of its on this is very far from being the case and the coult of thing causes are sufficiently obvious to those who see the vast dissimilarity of manner and intellect, principle, and feligious feeling, which separate them-and unapproachably so when as is too frequently the case, there is an intermixture of female Hindoo Britons

It was asserted, a few years since, that this race might often boast in its veins the blood of Jenghis Khan and Ao rungzebe-an assertion the absurdity of which six months' residence here abundantly evidences The prejudices of the natives, both Hindon and Mussulmaun, with regard to what they denominate caste, are too often thrust on your notice to escape knowledge Native women of the higher class are never the mothers of children by Europeans on the contrary, these women are generally of the very lowest class, frequently menials of the most degraded description. and as ignorant of the moral obligations of chastity and fidelity as midnight darkness of intellect can render them Scarcely elevated above the level of the beasts that perish, the glummering of reason they possess is just sufficient to teach them cunning, treachery, and petty theft During the first five or six, and sometimes ten or twelve years of life, their unfortunate children-the children likewise of a European gentleman-are left to their companionship, having no additional society bot that of bearers and other servants. and almost always unacquainted with any other language After this period they emigrate to some "Establishment for Young Ladies," at Madras or Calcutta where they are taught much that every thinking man would wish his wife or daughter to forget with all possible expedition A has sion for admiration and dress is generally-is universally, one of their acquirements, and their taste, as usual, bad in proportion to its extravagance, for the same want of mind which produces the desire, of course perserts its direction

A young man leaves England as a cadet or writer, buoyant in hope of Oriental splendour that is to realize the gor geous pictures of the Arabian tales He dreams of vales so fertile as acarcely to require the artificial aid of culture -of ease so entire as to be interrupted by no exertion. but the pursuit of pleasure-of wealth to be acquired with equal speed and facility, and honours to be attained at no distant period. And what is the reality to the military man? He soon discovers, that his income does not suffice to supply his actual wants, that it cannot meet the positive requirements of the climate. To incur debt is easy, and this leads to present extravagance and future ruin, or at best, to so protracted a residence in India, as to despoil him of his memory of home, his longing after it, his taste for the more enlightened society and enjoyments of Europe, and an apathy, destructive of all those energies which are necessary equally to his utility as a moral being, and his progress as an intellectual one Few sufficiently thirst after knowledge to pursue it for its own sake, when the excitement of emulation is lost, and the recompense of fame and distinction withdrawn So the promising youth sinks into the idle dangler after vain, and silly, and somewhat sulgar women, who are valued, as the African savage values glass beads, not for their intrinsic worth, but their novelty and rarity. In time he thinks of marriage, and he takes the first gril into whose society he may be thrown, whose affectation, extravagance, and ignorance, redouble his pecuniary difficulties, and his libations become more frequent, and years and disappointments intermediate in the property of the property of the and then—

"Alas ! Poor Yorick!"

If one instance beyond all others furnishes us with a proof of the powerful infloence exercised over the most distinguished intellect by partiality for those subjects, to the study of which it has been long and deeply devoted, it is the extraordinary prejudee in favour of the arts, the sciences, the literature, the religion, of the Hindoos, imblied by minds, distinguished on all other bounts for the

It is not within the compass of a short essay to enter extensively on so profound an investigation. But a slight sketch may be ventured as the result of a comparison of the assertions of various writers on India, with such observations and incuries as the residence of a European in soundest judgment and most accurate discrimination

the country may enable him to make

The Hindoo views of the Deity, so far from being sub lime or elevated, are, in the highest degree, gross and The mystical interpretation which some writers have endeavoured to put on their mythology, is by no means within the limits of the apprehension of the multitude, whose whole idea of religious mysteries is bounded by a Procession, or a Pooja, -a sacrifice to propinate the elements, or ten successive days and nights of the "sound-ing of psaltry, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music," to charm away the devil, and the sum total of whose derties. as avowed by a Brahmin, amounts to three hundred and thirty millions * The absurdities, the contradictions, the vague expressions, the inexplicable confusion of their sacred books, are palpable to the most superficial reader. who enters on their perusal with an unbiased judgment Nor is any inference in their favour to be drawn from the lofty expressions they occasionally apply to Brahma, which generally, like lights in a picture, stand out the more from the dark obscurity or absurdity which everywhere sur rounds them

Sanctity, according both to the doctrine and practice of the Hindoos, is but a series of successive inflictions of self-

. Tennant's Indian Recreations

torture, consequently he ranks most highly in their estimation, and receives the largest portion of their reverence, who voluntarily endures the most excruciating pains. Moral excellence they neither understand nor appreciate in their religious books, indeed, detached sentences may be found that seem to incilicate morality as an object more worthy of practice than mere ecremonies, such, however, are but insulated passages, the great mass of their doctrines tending to produce, and actually producing, amongst their disciples, directly contrary impressions, as the following facts will testify

Friedry to the marriage yow is a thing almost unknown amongst in their leems of opinion on this point, places on the relation of the property of the property

Amongst no people on the face of the earth are women holden in lower estimation than by the Hindoos. As the rank the female sex holds in the community is universally regarded as a criterion from which a judgment may be formed of the degree of civilization a nation has attained, we are compelled to place the Hindoos on the very lowest step of the scale. From husbands to wives, personal violence of the most cruel and brutal kind, somenimes even to death, is of common occurrence. The husband, moreover, has a power of divorce on almost every pretent with which captrice, passion, or revenge, can furcial him. The women, on the contrary, can never regam, there freedom from this tie, how severe soever may be the sufferings it entails on these.

Amongst the higher orders of Hindoos, as well as Mussumauns, the whole hie of women passes within the walls of the Zenanah in the structst confinement, a restraint from which the poverty of their husbands, and the necessuly of their performing vanous offices of labour, exempts the poorer classes The minds of all are most deplorably neglected, the least possible degree of cultivation being carefully withholden Nothing can more forcibly illustrate their degraded condition than the simple fact, that they are not permitted to eat with their husbands. Amongst the lower orders, the most laborious offices are performed by the women, such as the tiling of houses, beating chunam, carrying heavy burdens, &c &c, which, in highly civilized countries, always fall to the stronger sex.

The want of honesty in general, and of veracity more particularly, amongst the natives, may be traced to several causes, but it is sufficient here to mention one or two which are the most prevalent and the most potent. The chance of escaping punishment is one great temptation to crime all over the globe, for wherever this chance is greatest, there crimes most abound Unfortunately, it is matter of daily experience, that unless men are restrained by the dread of retribution here or hereafter, the natural moral principle, or instinct, for which some theorists contend is so feebly operative as to be, in fact perfectly meffectual It is very difficult, in a criminal court in India. to fix a charge upon a criminal, the cause of which is the great facility with which the prisoner can always procure witnesses to prove an alibi, to whom perjury is habitual and who, so far from considering it sinful, or a violation of the precepts of religion, deem it always pardonable. and sometimes even laudable Sir W Jones himself has said, "Perjury seems to be committed by the meanest, and encouraged by some of the better sort among the Hindoos and Mussulmauns, with as little remorse as if it were a proof of ingenuity, or even of merit" I have heard a magistrate declare that he could procure any number of witnesses to vouch any fact whatever, at the price of an anna an eath!

The reverence which they entertain for their priests. the Brahmins, probably exceeds that with which any other nation regard the ministers of their religion The Shas ters are compilations tending to enslave manland in the most complete mental thraldom to that class of the community with whom rests their interpretation, and for whose exaltation and pre eminence they appear to be expressly written Even the most absolute Hindoo princes have always been-those yet remaining on the native musnuds still continue to be-subservient to the will of the Brahmins. bending their legislative tyranny to the tyranny of priest hood, with an awed and timid reverence exceeding that paid by the most bigoted Roman Catholic prince to the infallible Head of his church The arrogance of the priest is imbibed from those sources from which he draws his code of rehgious belief There he learns that he is equal with his God, and superior to his prince, consequently, that he is above all law, and possesses, in a pre eminent degree, in his own person, the "right divine" of doing no wrong. Hear what their own Sacred Volumes declare "The Brahmin's power, which depends on himself, is greater than the royal power, which depends on himself, is greater than the royal power, which depends on this memory men."—"The Brahmin who shall retain in his memory the Rig Vedas, shall obtain salivation and bliss, even if he shall have slain three worlds "

The person of a Brahmin is considered sacred, and himself impeccable To entertain Brahmins sumptuously, is constantly inculeated on the Hindoos, abuse of a Brahmin subjects the offender to death by torture, stealing from one, to death by fire This contributes in no small degree to fill the minds of the multitude with awe of them; and the ignorance in which they are plunged acts as a powerful auxiliary They are prohibited from reading the Sacred Books, and just such portions are communica-ted as most directly tend to augment their veneration for the priesthood. They are instructed in the performance of certain ceremonies on which they are taught to believe that their salvation depends Their faith in an absolute fatality absolves them from a dependence on the issue of morality, and precludes their repenting of a guilt which seems compelled upon them by the invincible necessitythe dark Atys Moreover, their religious fears of the effects of disobedience subside before those two consoling causes—the knowledge that crime may be expiated by certain repetitions of forms of words-and that the priest has the power of absolving It is necessary, therefore, that the f wour of the priest should be secured at every risk Shaster permits occasional lying, and now the doctrine is inculcated, that in the service of a Brahmin it is not only allowable, but mentorious, therefore, to secure the desired absolution, perjury affords the readiest and most ef ficacious means. Thus to armie at the truth in the civil and military courts, where natives are partie, or evidence, is attended with almost insurmountable difficulty Laying aside positive falsehood, their evasiveners, fielr proverbial unwillingness to give a direct statement or afford a direct answer to any question, their exaggerations, resulting in a great measure from the genius of their language, their clouds of metaphor and hyperbole, the superfluous circumstances with which they overload every narration, render it one of the most tedious and trying tasks imaginable to investigate their complaints, or to decide on their enuses It seems a trial of their sagacity to out he each other

It is the policy of the Brahmins to make their own easte the sole depository of knowledge from rethat its diffusion is the communication of power and of freedom, they know that their despotism must cease, their influence, their honours, and their wealth evaporate, if once the avenues of science are open to the vulgar, if once they are permitted to inquire and to investigate It is to be hoped, nevertheless, that a spirit is abroad with healing on its wings the seat of government a wonderful change is effecting. men of the higher orders are beginning to emancipate themselves from the triple fetters in which more than three thousand ages have found them They are associated with Europeans, in literary and scientific societies, as well as in other undertakings They publish a journal in their own language, and printing is likely to be as efficacious in abolishing their superstitions, as it has been universally proved the mightiest engine in the amelioration of the intellectual and social condition of the nations of the West, The throwing of a greater portion of wealth into the hands of other classes, which has been the effect of our intercourse with them, must also produce beneficial effectsslow, perhaps, in their operation, but certain in their ultimate issue

No political constitution ever was made more adverse to the progress of intellect than that established by the Hindoo laws Bound by them to follow the vocation of his father, however contrary to his genius, hostile to his feelings, or humiliating to his ambition, a son must remain forever in the same sphere in which he was born, and from which, as neither heroism nor talent can elevate him. the stimulus to both is withdrawn No aristocracy in Eu rope even approaches to that exclusive spirit which sepa rates the Brahmin from the other orders, and places an eternal and impassable gulf between him and the unfortu nate Paria, that race born to bear the curse, "aliens to the commonwealth" of their brethren-" hewers of wood and drawers of water"-scorned and outcast-uncheered by hope-incapable of obtaining consideration from their kind-shut out from the social tie, as if foredoomed to vice, "hating and hateful" But, under the British government, they recover, in some degree, their privileges, and naturally become attached to rulers, under whom they are secure in the possession of the fruits of their industry, and, being a numerous body of the people, they are never des' picable as adherents

The respect entertained by the natives for our superior provess, our acquirements, and our science, is doubless a grand, a principal, security for the preservation of our inducace here. Another powerful cause exists, in their heirship of implicable enmity and batred that exists between the Mussulman and Huddoo population, who seem never to lose, the first the haughtiness and tyranny of conquer ors, and the latter, the vindictive feelings of the conquered and oppressed It would be difficult to find a motive suffi ciently strong to unite them in enterprise far less to ensure that unanimity amongst their leaders, that faith and that secrecy on which the success of every combination-especially of every conspiracy-must depend

'To leave the natives," says Dow, "entirely to their own laws, would be to consign them to anarchy and con The inhabitants of Beagal are divided into two religious sects, the Mohammedan and Hindoo almost equal in point of numbers. Averse beyond measure to one another, both an account of religion and the memory of mutual injuries, the one party will not now submit to the laws of the other, and the dissension which subsists between individuals would, without a pressure from another nower, spread in a flame over the whole kingdom therefore, absolutely necessary to the peace and prosperi ty of the country, that the laws of England, in so far as they do not oppose prejudices and usages which cannot be relinquished by the natives, should prevail." The insinu alion contained in this last sentence of Colonel Dow's la daily proved to be an act of diminishing necessity The abolition of a rite, to which the natives have adhered with extraordinary tenacity for ages, has been effected without the least symptom of commotion Many of the most dis tinguished Hindoos have advocated this measure of the government warmly, and the slight opposition which was raised by the mercenary class of the priesthood, has evan orated in a few letters conveyed to the public by the medi um of the press, and in the convening of a meeting which got up a remonstrance to government, that died a natural death, as the last cry of worn out prejudices generally exhales liself

One great obstruction to the redemption of the natives from their present abominable tholatry if that it encour ages and administers to atl their most viciet I passions and most depraved appetites Christianity is an arena of per petual conflicts with self, inculcating the severest restraint on the first, and the strictest setf-denial of the latter Atoreover, they are of perception so gross, as to be little suscept lble of impressions from any objects but those which strike vividiv on the senses, hence, probably, the policy of their priests adopted the expedient of those frequently recurring pageants, which flatter this appetite, and increase it by encouragement, almost every action of inc has its approprinte ceremony, every domestic event, every change of season The result of an attempt to modify Christianity to their apprehensions, is abundantly manifest in the Roman Catholicism of the native Portuguese, which is in nothing less absurd and idolatrous than Hindoolsm Christianity. in its reformed mode, is a worship so purely spiritual that nothing less than the Divine agency seems likely to be effective, in eausing it to be adopted as the real belief of the natives of this climate, in their present mental darkness. Wedded to nome and splendour, they despise a simplicity which they have not intellect enough to venerate, engross ed by the most determined sensuality, what to them is the hope that is spiritual? Dazzled by the voluntary tortures of their Yogees and Yanussees, they would discern noth ing to compensate for the loss of this' will worship' in the "sacrifice of an humble and contrite spirit." It is probable that the diffusion of knowledge will prepare the way for the reception of divine truth, by refining and purifying their minds gradually, but surely, by elevating the human intellect above the brute-sense, by weakening and eventually destroying their prejudices. Whether this immense improvement of their mental powers, this communication of the might of moral strength, be desirable in a political point of view, is not to enter into our consideration as Christians As sovereigns, it is our duty to ameliorate the condition of our subjects, and in our other higher character, as the depositories of sacred truth we are never to forget, that to be a means of evangelizing the world, is part of the tenure by which we hold our privileges, and we ought, in fiching that "we have nothing which we did not receive," to acknowledge, in every action our convic tion that the light is given to us, not to be "hidden under a bushel, 'but to be poured forth by every possible avenue, on "every nation, and tongue, and kindred, and language" under beaven

MANAGEMENT.

THERE are people in the world who are born diplomatists, who cultivate finesse as an art, and who, in their moral progress, have an invincible antipathy to a straight linewhose mental motion is, in fact, always spiral

"Shall I invite Vernon to dine to morrow?" said Mrs

Raymond to her bushand

"Why not? I understood it was to be a general thing," replied the gentleman

"Oh, my dear colonel, that is so like you, forgetting the utter, the complete impossibility of the thing! In that case, we must invite Mrs. Slade, you know, and there is her sis ter and his to be produced, of course, and they are rather good looking, I hear—not that I fear their throwing Rose into shade, she is too excessively pretty for that-but dis tracted attention-that is, divided attention, is always inju rious, and they say Arnold-the collector, not the lieuten ant-is rather struck with one, I forget which-and he is so perfectly unexceptionable-and then there is the Resident very desirous of seeing Rose, but fond of music, and Miss Slade plays well, and one cannot avoid asking her to try the new piano In fact, I have thought it wiser to have only married ladies-Mrs Barney, she squints-Mrs Gra ham, as dark as an Ayah-and Mrs Jones, who is really a perfect female Falstaff, and eats more than two aldermen So you see, it is by no means general, my love, and one can omit Vernon without being pointed, you

"But what for, Mrs Raymond? You have always so many reasons for what you choose to do, that, confound me, if I can understand one"

"Depend on it, my dear colonel, nothing is to be done in this world without proper address you are so terribly opaque, that you would spoil the best management on earth However, either I am to act as I please with regard to your niece, or I give up the whole concern, and, more-over, I am positively decided on not inviting Vernon"

"Once again, why, I ask?"

"Were they not fellow passengers on board, and is not the voyage the eternal subject of discussion whenever I am so foolish as to allow him to be admitted? And is not Rose evidently quite delighted to talk with him? And have not I seen her neglect other people when he comes un to her as we ride out at night? However, I have desired the horse-keeper to report the horse lame, so I have secured that point at least. The carriage is much safermuch more correct—though, by the way, Vernon thinks proper to trot his horse by her side even then Very presuming and forward that young man-for a subaltern, moreover, and not on the staff !"

"Precisely my awn position when we married, Mrs. Ray-

"Yes, my dear, true, I was n very foolish yaung girl then, and had no sound advisers. One gets wise too late let Rose, therefore, have the benefit of my experience"

"A thousand thanks, my love"

"Nay, my dear, I mean na camplaint. You are very unexceptionable as men go, and I assure you I find na fault with you, except that you are rather obtuse an all matters af management—so necessary, too, as it is Hawever, you must agree with me, that if I did only well, there is no reason why Rose should not do better, and I consider it my duty to try the best for your niece, Colonel Raymand"

"Very good, my dear, anly if, as you say, there should be any attachment between these two young peaple-Rase and Vernon-"

"I say? Excuse me, Calanel Raymond, this is a very extraordinary charge, and one which I am the last person in the world in deserve I did, indeed, hint at the possibil ity of some firtation existing, which, though the farthest in the world from any thing serious, might be in the highest degree injurious to the best interests of aur dear Rose There is a wide difference between a flirtation and an at tachment, my dear, but, nevertheless, it may give rise to unpleasant reports, and I must have my way in this point,"

And Mrs Raymand, as usual, not in this point only, but in every point, had her way, and the dinner was given, and

Vernon was not invited

Rose, however, felt his exclusion, and was offended by it but Mrs Raymond was too well satisfied with her own powers, to dread any very unpleasant results from the displeasure of her ward.

It is a delicate thing to state with precision a lady's age Mrs Raymond, perhaps, might be verging to that period which is so clearly and happily defined as a certain age, because it is just the most uncertain epoch in the life of immense course, succeeded by sweetmeats and fruits, a dessert, in fact, placed on the table before the cloth was withdrawn There was abundance of expensive English luxuries hermetically sealed salmon cakes and preserves of all kinds, costly wines cooled with saltpetre, liqueurs the chef d gurres of the French distillery, all that could gratify the appetite, please the eye, or brighten the imagina tion. There was a hecatomb of compliments offered to the presiding divinity, that homage which she loved so well During the process of cating, there was little attempt at conversation, but the corporeal wants of man being sa tiated, there was some effort made to supply his mental cravings The silent smoked hookabs, and listened most patiently to the talkers, soothed into tranquility by the monotonous lullaby of the bubbang water Nevertheless, it was a very dull party, passing the dulness of Indian en tertainments generally The resident talked of Miss Slade's playing, and the collector toasted Mrs Slade's sister, and Rose was in the sullens, and quite impracticable She made no impression, that was evident, and, as Mrs Raymond justly said, "the party was evidently thrown away"

Mrs Raymond had too much tact to notice her mece's dissatisfaction, far less to attribute it to Vernon's absence She never attempted by any overt act to restrain the freedom of her intercourse with him, and when he called she received him with that frank friendliness which she extend ed to all her acquaintance, never perceptibly distinguishing the superior rank, which really formed the passion of her soul, if she had a soul She was too skilful a general to betray her tactics to the enemy, occasionally she spoke with a sigh of pity of the miseries necessarily to be endured by subalterns and their wives, regretted the total want of interest which completely excloded so many fine and meri torious young men from the staff, bewailed the privations to be endured by well-educated young women who, by marrying thoughtlessly, put themselves out of the reach of those comforts and indulgences which plooe can render India tolerable, and pressed on the view of her fair listener the attention paid to half a dozen married women whose incomes afforded them all the splendours of life Rose was young, flexible, never of very strong mind, and educated for India She liked Vernon passing well, and any mani festation of opposition to her attachment, on the part of her protectress, might have had the effect of confirming that attachment. But she had been taught to place a high value on position, and the luxuries that attend large incomes and superior rank She had not strength of mind sufficient to face the severe conomy which must mark a subaltern's hie, or condemn him to perpetual debt and exile. She flirted with Vernon, without any intention of marrying him, and accented at length-thrice happy moment of Mrs Raymond's ambition -Mr Arnold, the collector, who had been scorched beneath five and twenty summer suns in In dia, without any worse effects than liver, * corpulence, and a saturnine complexion

Vernon thought himself ulted, and was highly indignant. But these more violent emotions soon die a natural death in a tropical climate Mrs Arnold was quite the fashion, she gave magnificent parties-sported superb equipagescarriages, elephants, luxuries both of the east and the west. received visiters of all classes with amiable good temper, and, Vernon resolving also to visit her, commenced a flirt ation at the house of a mutual acquaintance, and from that moment the affair was en train

It was very soon a matter of course, that Mrs Arnold should be driven every evening in a curricle Vernon sport ed at this time, to the great scandal of the field officers of the station. He must be involving bimself very deeply, they said, no subaltern could afford two horses in addition to his riding horse. He might wait six or eight years for his company yet, and in the mean while his debts would be increasing to a fearful magnitude. And what in the world was Arnold doing? Was he blind, and could not see? or deaf, and could not hear, what all the world were talking about? And where were Mrs Raymond's wits? Had she lost her acuteness and penetration, which she was everlastingly employing in affairs that did not concern her? It was a great pity her faculties, which were so con stantly directed to the benefit of the universe at large, were not a little more useful in the ruidance of her own connex. ions It was really to be lamented that she had chosen the precise time for napping, when it was most requisite that she should be wide awake

Mrs Raymond did awake at length, and she set herself to divert the current of affairs with all possible address

It may be questioned whether she really felt all the un easiness she wished to persuade herself that she actually suffered Such a fine field of management did not frequently invite her powers So much delicacy, so much tact was required She passed two sleepless nights in deciding on the best method of commencing her operations Should she write to Rose? No, she did not think epis

. In Ind an phraseology a person suffering from hepatic affection is said to have liver, probably because in seven cases out of ten he has almost none

tolary communications half so effectual or persuasive as oral Should she alarm her conscience-rouse her pride -or appeal to her feelings? It would be too tedious to follow her thoughts through all their meanderings The result was the following note

"MY DEAR ROSE.

"Will you be at home, and quite alone, this morning, at noon precisely? I wish to pass an hour with you icle-a tite, if you can spare me so long You know that I am not a very formidable personage, and you cannot therefore, refuse me on the ground of slarm

"Yours, very much, "JANE RAWMOND"

To which the following answer was returned

"My DEAR MR. RAYMOND,

"I should have the greatest delight in receiving you as you propose, but Vibert, the artist, is to have a sitting as you propose, but the hour you mention, and Mr Arnold is anxious that my portrait should be completed without delay, as V quite thus very shortly. Any other time, if I am fortunate enough to be disengaged, I shall devote an hour to my dear Mrs Raymond, without any alarm, and with "Yours, affectionately, Rose Arnold" the greatest pleasure

Now Mrs Raymond had not exactly calculated on being refused so, as she could not obtain the interview she desired, she made her call at noon nevertheless and con trived to be present during the whole of this aitting Ver non was one of the guests, but as Mr Arnold himself was also there to superintend the efforts of the artist, and ami ably unconscious that any other person was at the same time superintending the appearance and attitude of the exceedingly pretty original, birs Raymond thought she could not very plausibly mention the circumstance to Rose, as objectionable At length the sitting was over, and there scemed to be a tacit struggle between Mrs Raymond and Mr Vernon to compel the other to depart. Af length the lady invited herself to tilin , but as the gentleman was very quickly and quietly seated at the hospitable board, it seemed evident that his presence there had been expected. Mrs Raymond finally was compelled to beat a retreat, being for this time completely out generalled Mrs. Raymond had always given her niece credit for the greatest possible simplicity an I facility of character calculated on her being pliant to the influence of superior mind-(Mrs Raymond patromsed that word mind even beyond the cant of the day)-as the osier to the wind It was a great pity that the accuracy of her views of things was so much distorted by considering the position she her self was to assume, more than that in which others actual ly appeared She was so engaged in planning her own operations, that she overlooked the important circum stance, that an unforeseen movement of the enemy might entirely derange her projects She forgot that the very error-she did not even dream that it might deserve a harsh er name-on account of which she went to remonstrate. must, in the very outset, destroy all the simplicity of Mrs Arnold's character, and quickly render her an adept in management, competent to baffle the keenness of the most vimlant inspector of her actions She forgot that woman's first attempt at concealment is the first admission of the serpent into Eden

Mrs Raymond felt herself constantly baffled in all her attempts at gaining a tote & tête with Rose , but she had no cause of complaint Mrs Arnold always received her visits with the greatest pleasure, indeed with an unusual appearance of affection-but then she was never alone, not for one minute; while Mrs Raymond remained with Rose also paid frequent visits to her uncle, every devoir of this kind was punctually fulfilled, but she always came attended with such a sugarree, as Mrs Raymond called it that any confidential intercourse was out of the nuestion And this lasted for more than a month, until Mrs Raymond's temper began to lose its equanimity, and her vexation at being out manaucred by a child, as she called her niece, mingled some resentment with her better feelings Finding, therefore, her progress completely ob structed in this direction, she turned, like a person to whom all routes are equal that conduct him to his destination. into a different path

Colonel Raymond received her first hints of the matter with ridcule and positive incredulty. But the mere repetit on of an assertion unassisted by any additional weight of evidence, goes far to endstung our faith on its side When once he was sufficiently wrought on to view the subject as serious, he saw enough to corroborate all Mirs Raymond a assertions and he felt, more deeply than she did, all the misery that threatened Rose, because he had no ambition of displaying his sown elevenness, or of introducing himself amongst the characters of the scene as an adviser, a judge, or an avenger. Moreover, he had a very deen feeling of the shame and dishonour that shrouds an erring wife, notwithstanding his long absence from Eu rope, and he thought no risk too great, no action too hazardous to prevent the fixing of so tremendous a stigma on the child of his brother He was a very straight forward person, and it struck him that the individual most concerned in the business was the husband, who was likely to be the severest sufferer Colonel Raymond never dreamed that it might be expedient to temporize, that it would be well if the endangered wife's progress were stopped without her possible errors being brought at all under her husband's cognizance, and though Colonel Raymond had a very proper conjugal feeling of the general clever ness of his wife, he had some suspicion that she occasion ally over managed her own concerns, as well as other people's, and he had a thorough conviction, not the result of any long process of internal reasoning that his best plan would be to go quietly and directly to Mr Arnold, and ad vise his cutting Mr Vernon dead with all convenient speed

Mr Arnold was aghast Supine, from the effect of long residence in India, and from his habitual yielding to the climate, he had been satisfied with seeing the very beauti ful face of his wife clothed in constant smiles, with hearing her cheerful laugh, and with sitting down daily at a table covered with a splendid dinner, and surrounded with lively guests He thought Vernon an excellent fellow, and was well pleased that Mrs Arnold shared this feeling she preferred Vernon's curncle to her own carnage, he saw no reason why her preference should be opposed If she selected him as her chevalier at a ball, as her escorte thither and thence, well and good, it saved her husband the annoyance of accompanying her, and the disagreeable-ness of teasing her by keeping her at home. Mr Arnold had an excellent temper, and really suffered so much from causing pain to any human being, that a species of amiable selfishness rendered him the most obliging person in the world No husband on earth could be more indulgent. It seemed as if the chief gratification his large income af forded him, was to administer to her taste for jewels and equipages, and those delights which are generally most coveted by the young He was pleased to be considered by her the very kindest being of her acquaintance, and he received her lively thanks for every fresh proof of his at tachment, with the fond delusion that they originated in that mingling of love and gratitude which constitutes, probably, the best principle of conjugal affection And now to be so rudely awakened to be told that he might possibly be a dupe, the dupe of a mere garl, whom he petted as a play-thing, and whose nature he had deemed as guileless as that of the just fledged bird that makes its first flight from the parent nest! Mr Arnold was completely overcome: an instant sufficed to convert the "milk of human kindness," with which his heart abounded, into gall His vehement Indignation assumed a character the more formidable, from his general state of quiescence and equanimity It was long before Colonel Raymond could persuade him to adopt such measures as were necessary at once to secure his wife's virtue and her reputation. He condemned the colonel, Mrs Raymond, and hunself, for their blameable blindness, he execrated Vernon for his meditated sin against every law of morality, every bond of hospitality, he alternately exaggerated and extendated the weakness, themeditated ingratitude of his wife But the stormy mood exhausted itself at length by its violence, and when the colonel left him, he was satisfied that he would immediately adopt that course of conduct which was most likely to result in the preservation of his honour, and the redemption of his happiness

Mrs Raymond was perfectly enrages that the colonel had ventured on this important step whout asking her advice or opinion. She fluing from him in a fit of high dis dain, and despatiched instantly the following missive to Rose, in the persuasion that she was actuated merely by the benevolent feeling of apprising her of the exact situation in which she stood. If she could have detected the disproportionate measure of the desire of counteracting the imbecile plans of her husband, as she called them, she might berham, have felt less complacency in the analysis of her feelings

"MY DEAR ROSE,

"I have in vain endeavoured for some time to give you a hint of the various rumours that are in circulation, not only through the cantonment, but in fact throughout the presidency, of your violent flutation with Mr Vernon You have so perseveringly avoided any confidential communication with me, that I am at last alriven to this very unsafe method of conveying to you intelligence which, perhaps, will now reach you too fate I have no lessure for preparation, and it is not expedient to delay. In a word, Mr Arnoid is in possession of some fact connected with you and Mr Vernon, which will probably lead to an immediate Eclarisament, for which my desire is to give you warning to prepare yourself. What may be the real state of the case you only can be aware At any rate, to be taken quite unawares, might elicit some sudden disclosure, which it would be prudent to avoid, and which might en lighten Mr Arnold more perhaps than would be desirable, lighten Mr Anderson I am by no new in the first truly, "Yours, very truly, "Jane Raymons" if, indeed, of which I am by no means certain, any thing

In the evening of that day the whole cantonnient was in a state of agitation Mrs Arnold had quitted her hus band's house, and was actually living in Mr Vernon's

quarters

The next circumstance to which public attention was directed was a duct between the deserted husband and the criminal lover The whole proceeding was conducted with the greatest regularity. There was nothing that could possibly be construed into the slightest tincture of unfairness in either party But Mr Arnold found his satisfaction in death, and Mr Vernon honourably added the character of murderer to that of seducer and adulterer

Mrs Raymond's agony was boundless Her conscience unbraided her incessantly with her ill judged interference She went through all the paroxysms of feeling to which a person of her busy, active, vain temper may be supposed to be subject under the influence of remorse. Her internal admissions of erroneous judgment and foolish precipitation were unextenuated even by her general habits of self complacency It was the first time that the bad effects resulting f om the spirit of management had ever been dis played to her in forcible colours, and now the whole picture was so appaling, so awful! She could not be persuaded to view the body of Mr Arnold her victim she called him, -and her imagination clothed him in horrors beyond even the terrible reality She was wrought to a perfect fever of mind which partook of insanity, and the images that were perceptible to her mental vision were terrific as they were incongruous Sometimes she charged the whole on the guilty widow, sometimes on Vernon, on herself for, let her accusations wander where they might, they invaria bly returned to this point Disturbed by the cruellest remorse, she suffered the natural consequence in this climate of feelings violently excited-she was the prey of a pro longed and dangerous fever

That the guilty Mrs Arnold endured in her first feelings of anguish the measure of the divine vengeance on her crime, may be imagined, but naturally of a temper that skims only the surface of things, she was not long without the al leviation that time brings to every sorrow. She was very much disposed to attribute the whole affair to Mrs. Raymond's violent proceeding,—to the foolish chit which had brought on a crisis neither site nor Vernan had ever before contemplated very detinctly. Then she went hack to her marriage—her forced marriage site called it, overlooking the triling circumstance of its being entirely he result of her own free-will; if she had been permitted to marry Vernon! if she had not been cert-presentations of the privations to which the wife of a sublatern was exposed,—representations too so greatly exaggerated! And thus "she laid the faitering unction to her soul?" until she brought herself to receive Colonel Raymond with composure.

The colonel felt as a man on whose honour a stain had been cast by the misconduct of a person so nearly connected with him; he felt also, as a friend, the death-the sudden, the awful death, of a being he had esteemed. Neither was he insensible to the evils of poverty, and obseurity, and disgrace, to which his most criminal niece had exposed herself. He expected to see her overwhelmed with remorse-subdued by repentance-sinking beneath the despair of the dark future. He came prepared to speak words of comfort; to offer protection,-a shelter in England,-the relief of competence to obscurity. He meant to say," Sin no more," and to offer the means of preserva-tion. The reception of him was naturally an agitated one. "Some natural tears she dropped, but wiped them soon;" she discussed every topic calmiv-spoke of the future with something approaching to cheerfulness-condemned the whole of Mrs. Raymond's proceedings most unserupulously-extenuated all her own share of the transaction. and represented heracif as the victim of her nunt's too great love of controlling everybody, and managing all the world. Poor Colonel Raymond was completely overwhelmed by finding her in a state of mind so contradictory of all his anticipations. He had arranged his mind for offering consolation, and he found himself the person who most needed it. He became at length indignant, and inwardly confessed that no heartlessness exceeds that of a fool, and that a man may as well hope to impress a statue with deep or high feelings, as that most impracticable of all created things-a pretty idsot. However, the colonel did not suffer his indignation to counteract the designs of his benevolence; with recovered composure he steadily advised Mrs. Arnold to proceed to England forthwith—to have no fear of a provision for the future, because, having been the cause of her being brought to this country, and having advised the marriage that had been dissolved under circumstances so awful and painful, he held himself bound to care for her future provision

Mrs Arnold was quite astomshed that the colonel could contemplate any other line of conduct for Mr Vernon and herself than a marriage as soon as possible She did not doubt they would be able to exist comfortably she did not require splendour, and if the people of the cantonment did not choose to visit her, she could exist without them and then Vernon would soon get his company and when he was a major, he would pay his debts, and, on the whole, she was sure they should get on very well as soon as this misfortune was a little forgotten

"You cannot forget-you will never forget that Mr Vernon is your husband's murderer " said the colonel, pro

voked into severity

"It was all quite fair, and if one were to call every duel-ist a murderer-" She burst into tears Colonel Raymond dispinguished between the agritation of grief and that of passion "I have but one word to add," said he "to waive all suggestion of the impropriety of a marriage under your circumstances-Vernon is under arrest, and will as surely be dismissed as he will be tried by a court martial he will have no means of supporting you and I tell you, Rose, very plainly, that you have nothing to rely on but the plan I offer Suppose your marriage with this man to take place, and our connexion, our intercourse, cease forever? Take time to reflect, and let me have your answer tomorrow " Whether she was capable of reflecting may be doubted.

however, she did marry Mr Vernon
As Colonel Raymond had predicted, he was dismissed the service An income of one hundred and fifty pounds yearly, the recent bequest of his father whose death had been hastened by the report of his son's misconduct, was their sole earthly resource they retired to France, and remain there at present, in what degree of comfort may be conjectured, by reflecting that Vernon had, for ten years, been accustomed to Indian habits and indulgences-that his wife was educated entirely with a view to visiting In dia on a matrimonial speculation, and is as vain, shallow, and thoughtless, as a woman of that class may be imag ined-that she enjoyed the luxuries of Colonel Raymond's house on her first arrival in the East, and subsequently was surrounded by all the expensive comforts and su perfluities which affection could lavish round her. No rational person can doubt that their lives are spent in a succession of reproaches, repentance, prustation, and disgust—all that makes this world a type of that more fearful judgment which is to constitute the darkness of a future one.

mother, brothers, sisters, when India was to us as a land of dreams We were all assembled preparatory to going to church, and I heard the cheerful bells, their tunefully monotonous chime coming sweetly to the ear, as the wind bears it over the little river that runs between our house and the church. What a picturesque church! all overgrown with ivy and moss, so that the windows are absolutely curtained with it The very graves in the churchyard look cheerful, covered with verdant turf, and that wee modest crimson upped flower," which is sprinkled, like stars, over every patch of ground in these days of spring tide In the evening we rambled through the meadows, by the river, through the woods Yonder hill is a chronicle of a thousand lessons delivered to us during those Sunday walks, by the affectionate voice of him whose wisdom excelled in reaching our understandings through our hearts But the hour of awakening from all delightful visions must come I am always a better man when I can lose the Indian in the Englishman That moment of awaking to the reality, how bitter it is to leave home again, and feel the desolating curse propounced on the first wanderer !

Monday -Beautiful and memorable specimen of native talent and ingenuity Woke this morning at three o'clock, am not aware that any noise disturbed me A fine metaphysical inquiry into the extent of instinct, sympathies, and antipathies, might be sufficiently diverting if I had patience for it Found the corner seam of the khenaut cut open, just at the foot of my couch, and a bullock trunk abstract ed Rose in alarm and called my wife, who, naturally enough, went into hysterics, at the consciousness of the 'tinef's former proximity Gave the alarm, and a hot pursuit commenced Ascended an adjacent bund, found the trunk broken open, and sundry of its contents scattered about, the thieves having apparently been interrupted in the act of examining the spoil Recovered the major portion of the wearing apparel, but saw no traces of forty ru pees which had been deposited therein Found, on inquiry, that the chain which ought to secure the trunks, had peen missing at the last stage Have not the least doubt one of my own fellows was, if not the perpetrator, at least particeps criminis All attempts at discovering the robbers of course useless, the village police have generally an interest in sheltering them from discovery In most cases, they receive no inconsiderable dividend from the fruits of iniquity, and give protection in exchange. We have nothing left for it but endurance. The loss is heavy just now, but recovery is hopeless, and if we fixed the progress with the usual disagreeables-one day so like another that we are obliged to consult the route, to know that time is really travelling onward at his usual pace. My wife ridicules the attempt at keeping a journal on a march in India, which, she says, is less interesting than a logbook, masmuch as there is less variation-of the compass, I suppose, she means But how can I contrive to pass the day otherwise? Hamilton's Gazetteer, and a volume of Sir John Malcolm, will not last forever, nor can they be always endured Now there are great helps towards putting an hour to death, in this attempt at journalizing Prepar-ing the paper, pens, and ink, of which the latter is dried up before I am willing to dispense with its aid, then, thinking over all I have seen, for the sake of discovering what I shall say, then reading what has been written, in order to avoid repetition, "stale, flat, and approfitable" In short, I recommend a diary to all travellers by land with tents, going at the rate of ten miles per diem, as the best possible recipe against suicide. It affords a safe vehicle for the passage of all atribibous vexations and irritabilities the more caustic your tournal, the less danger of its being dull, and the more abusive you are of your enemies in its pages, tha better satisfied will you be with yourself in the secret sanctuary of your own heart Besides, whatever evidence it may afford of your proficiency in bathos, it will at least present a durable record to yourself of those "perils of field and flood," which have threatened murder to your talents, if you have any, and shipwreck to your hopes, if you require more solid fulfilment of them than " fool's paradise "

Monday —Our supplies are on the eve of exhauston, but luckily we are within five days' march of our destination Despatched a chit to Andrews, desiring him to send out a cool, with the needful, found, as soon as I had sent away the letter, that three of my bulbocks are completely done up Have endeavoured to persuade the puttail of the village to press others into our service. Inaccessible to all persuasions, and was obliged to speak to his feelings at last by the medium of two rupes, a species of vernacular which seemed most perfectly comprehensible to him. The bullocks were brought to us with all practicable speed.

Tuesday—Most disagreeable march Found that the puttal had puckaloged the bullocks from a poor villager, of whose working fiches they constituted the greater part. The owner followed as the whole day's journey, crying volently, and beating his mouth, after the Hindu manner. In vain 1 promised him a reasonable remuneration the more attention 1 appeared to pay to his lamentations, the theft on one of our own people, his refuge would be flight, and his services are valuable here, where he cannot be replaced. Oh for a journey through England in the mail, on a Macadamized road, even if it were in the character of coachee, or his subaltern, the guard! Question if our cash will carry us to the end of our march, and to get a supply is impossible. My wife miserably low spirited, and crying after home!

6*

Tueday—Got newspapers by Tappal to day, and a let ther from Andrews—kind, friendly, and just what a brother officer ought to be Invites us to put up in his quar ters on journing, until we can find a house Very glad to find ourselves certain of a shelter, Ann is quite enlivened by the prospect, notwithstanding the retrospect of last inght's losses. Find by the Gazeite, that Heyland is actually arrived, so have nothing let for it but to look forward patiently to the prospect of his being a dead fixture these next six years. The service gets worse duly, and is now really fit only to be considered a refuge for the destitute To send here a man with the birth and education of a gen tieman must be an act of madness. It is to chain him to abballernship and starvation, as well as pligue and pesti

Wednesday - Kept awake all last night by the perform ance of a marriage ceremony in the village. We were nitched so close as to have the full benefit of their horrible discord What is meant by a natural taste for musio? Since my arrival in this country, I have begun to suspect it may not be so entirely a gift as one imagines, and that the term natural taste, means in fact, nothing 'Why are the natives so enamoured of tones which are caricatures of the vilest drone of a Scotch bagpipe, mingled with the shrieks of the most unmanageable horn to which stage coach guard ever applied the force of his lungs? Why are the voices of their public singers, their nautch girls so coarse and tuneless, as to out herod the most car piercing dealer in ballads? Since we believe that the organs of human beings have the same construction, why do these Hindoos feel as much disgust in listening to our most eloquent music, as we feel with the wearssome monotony of their limited scale? Yet, they say, that though Europeans may doubtless excel them in their mechanical and scien tific skill in almost any other art, the palm of n usical su periority must questionless be assigned to these Asiatics! How could Sir W Jones, having the gift of his two ears withal permit himself to compose an elaborate essay on the music of the Hindoos?

Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday -- Made the usual

progress with the usual disagreeables-one day so like another that we are obliged to consult the route, to know that time is really travelling onward at his usual pace. My wife ridicules the attempt at keeping a journal on a march in India, which, she says, is less interesting than a log book, masmuch as there is less variation-of the compass. I suppose, she means But how can I contrive to pass the day otherwise? Hamilton's Gazetteer, and a volume of Sir John Malcolm, will not last forever, nor can they be al ways endured Now there are great helps towards putting an hour to death, in this attempt at journalizing Preparing the paper, pens, and iak, of which the latter is dried up before I am willing to dispense with its aid, then, thinking over all I have seen, for the sake of discovering what I shall say, then reading what has been written, in order to avoid repetition, "stale, flat, and unprofitable" In short. I recommend a diary to all travellers by land with tents, going at the rate of ten miles per diem, as the best possible recipe against suicide. It affords a safe vehicle for the passage of all atribilious vexations and irritabilities the more causic your journal, the less danger of its being dull. and the more abusive you are of your enemies in its pages. the better satisfied will you be with yourself in the secret snactuary of your own heart Besides, whatever evidence it may afford of your proficiency in bathos, it will at least present a durable record to yourself of those ' perils of field and flood," which have threatened murder to your talents, if you have any, and shipwreck to your hopes, if you require more solid fulfilment of them than " fool's paradise"

Monday —Our supplies are on the ere of exhauston, but luckly we are within five days' march of our destination Despatched a chit to Andrews, desiring him to send out a conil, with the needful, found, as soon as I had sent a way the letter, that three of my bullocks are completely done up Have endeavoured to persuade the puttal of the vil lage to press others into our service. Haccessible to all persuasions, and was obliged to speak to his feelings at last by the medium of two rupess, a species of vernacular which seemed most perfectly comprehensible to him. The bullocks were brought to us with all practicable speed.

Tueday—Nost disagreeable march Found that the puttail had puckelozed the bullocks from a poor villager, of whose worldy fiches they constituted the greater part The owner followed us the whole day's journey, crying violently, and beating his mouth, after the Hindu manner. In vain 1 promised him a reasonable remuneration the more attention 1 appeared to pay to his lamentations, the louder they became If there had been any earthly means of getting the bargage on without the and of the animals in question, I would gladly have restored them forthwith, for I puted the hardship put on the manby the Assatic Dogberry But what could humanity do in such a case? I was hard of heart "on compulsion" and contrived to keep his ear barrowing complaints out of my wife's hearing, by riding considerably in advance of her palanquin I knew that his sorrows would not diminish his speed, and calculated accurately that I should find him at my strrup on dismounting Ascertained as soon as possible that we could procure carriage at this village, and damssed my noisy follower, with his cattle, considering his journey well repaid by a ruppe for canable wast, and some annas

Wednesday — Met our supplies, and a basket of bread from Andrews What a treatafter the indigestible country

Thursday—All well, shall be with the regiment, thank God' at sunvise to morrow. My wife quite happy, and the poor child quite well. I wonder what Andrews will think of them! Should not be in the least surprised the were to marry. It certainly gives a man respectability, and shall advise it strenusch.

A LEGEND OF BERAR.

Ir was a morning delicions as had ever dawned on the fruitful province of Berar In the month of November the blue of the sky was less deep than in the summer months; but its radiance was as intense and as unshadowed by a single cloud. There it lay in its repose as an upper ocean, becalmed, clear, glassy, and transparent, and cool airs breathed beneath it, calling the animal spirits into play, whilst every pulse in nature seemed to beat healthful music. The sun was vivid, and brilliant still; but its rays had lost their scorching feri our and their exhausting power The whole earth was covered with a livery of cheerful and healthful green .- the evidence of the falling of the rains that had so lately passed away, leaving plenty and fertility in their tract. The whole district was richly cultivated corn and pasture-land, thickly peopled with numerous villages, and the road which wound through it was so well defined as to prove that intercourse was frequent and great.

The summit of one of the loguest of a range of hills that runs by the village of Ramteck, is crowned by a pagoda of extraordinary note Hither, at stated seasons, resort princes, nobles, and people, to perform ceremonies, and offer sacrifices in propination of the god. And to the evening, during such season, the vast pile, splendidly illuminated, shines like a meteor before the eyes of the distant traveller, to whom, under these cicumstances, it is visible when yet many miles divide him from it. works invade the territories of the night birds, and nt intervals the pale blue lights shed their cadaverous hue over groups of votaries winding in procession up the steep ascent. And well do the revenues of the priestly Brahmins there testify to the profusion with which the most parsimonious Hindoo will decorate his altars, well satisfied with the profit of such expenditure, -a state of superior enjoyment in his next transmigration

The festival in the year to which this sketch refers, 17..., had been marked by peculiar splendour. It was the first that had occurred stoce the accession of the present Rajah, and the dethronement of the late sovereign Bravely had the unfortunate prince contended for the preservation of his dominions, until gradually his troops, allured by the better fortune of his rival, deserted from his standard, and swelled the host of his foe. Above all, the foul defection of his former favorate and munister, Bheemiah, had so dishearenced his few remaining adherents, that even those who were not faithless enough to array themselves against him, were too timid to brave further conflicts, and returned, under the shade of darkness, to their own homes. Alone and helpless, therefore, it seemed that he had bowed to stern necessity, and sought the shelter of some impenction becomes the contended to the contended the heart of no more than the contended the shade of the contended the heart of no more than the contended the shade of the contended the heart of no more than the contended that the contended that the contended the shade of the contended that the

Amidst rejoicings, as loud as they were groundless, the present Rajah ascended the musuod. Bheeminh still continued about the court, but he occupied no distinguished position there. If he had ever entertained hopes that such was to be the reward of his treachery, they were disappointed. Bheeminh was treated by the new sovereign with cordulatity,—was the partaker of his master's reveiry, the companion of his sports, sometimes the pander to his pleasure, but not his counsellor. And his spirit became dark, for he was ambitious, fond of pre-eminence, above all, a lover of power, and he ale bitterness, when he felt that he was used, but he was not trusted

The Rajah was a bold and daring man He chose his ministers with sagneity, and exercised extraordioary sway over the minds of his immediate dependants, by that strength of will and fearlessness of consequences, which assumes the appearance of power of mind, and, for the most part, produces the same practical effects Like all . monarchs who feel that they bold their possessions by an insecure tenure, he was desirous of attaching to himself a band of firm adherents, in the persons of his army and their leaders Honours and emoluments, therefore, fell to the share of those whose favour he was, in fact, soliciting, whilst his subjects were ground by a load of oppressive imposts, the produce of which went to defray the expenses of his past war, and to furnish preparations to meet the possibility of a future one Consequently the nation, in general, were beginning to regret the monarch they had deposed, and to contrast the ease of his peaceful rule with the exactions of these more stirring times. The Rajah was by no means ignorant that the spirit of discontent was abroad, and in every proud throb of his heart he felt, let his rival appear on the stage again, and the results of a conflict might be, - how widely different !

It was the last morning of the festival The concluding rite had been performed, and the Rajah and his suwarree wound, in long and magnificent procession, down the sacred precincts of the Temple A long line of elephants. with their crimson trappings and gilt howdahs, paced slowly and majestically onward, bearing the prince and his nobles, and there were proud war horses snuffing the wind, with "thunder on their necks," "smelling the battle afar off," and carrying spearmen, and "men of renown" And then there was a gorgeous cavalcade of scarlet palanquins concealing the Begum and her ladies from the vulgar gaze, and a numerous retinue of guards, with their gay turbans and habiliments, adding to the picturesque variety of the scene Gayety was on every brow, whatever might be hidden in the heart, for the Rajah went to hold a feast with his court at his summer palace of Nuggerdund

Very recently had that fortress, for which was been erected, and with eager currosity the court stopped before the portal to examine its carved arnaments, and to utter such encomiums as are ever ready for the possession of a prince. The complicated machinery of its fastenings at length permitted their entrance, the dissonant band stationed in a guard room above sent forth a crash of sound; all descended from their various carriages, and with the slow etiquette of an Indian court, entered through an unner

door into the gardens

Every fruit of the season, every flower of the clime, bloomed there. Numerous fountains threw up their glutering waters in the sun, and long terraced walks offered a smooth pathway to the guests. The air was loaded with the richest perfumes of the East, and all things tempted to remain there. But the prince held a durbar in his hall, and all nature's beauties—all the decorations with which air had linested them—became mysible to eyes litent on advancement. The throng hastened to the durbar, as in sects to the taper, and the gardens, lovely as they were, were described.

The day had long since waned, and the mirth of the meeting had gradually sunk not silence, the voice of the nautch was hushed, and the forms which had floated in light were seen no more. It was midagilt, and the meon's creacent was on the very verge of the houson. The starry hearen were looking out on sullness, for of the living things that moved beneath them, an that spot, hone broke the silence, and the uplifted eyes that answered the glances of those stars, seemed as pregnent with unuterable mystenes.

On the rampart, so far from the bashon as to be beyond hearing of the sentinel, stood the Rajah, and by his side, with an air of strong excitement, stood also the once pow

crful Bheemiah

The silence was long, and the countenance of the prince gloomed into deeper darkness At length, suddenly starting into motion, he spoke, as if waking from a trance of thought.

"Bicemush, thou hast served me well' he said "hasy, I read thy reproach of neglect and long forgettimates. Trust me, it has not been so, but thou knowest, of all men, he who would rule prudently is most feltered. But now, at length, at length, Bicemush, the hour approaches—the hour is some—when thy, mester shall no more appear un grateful, even to thee, but thou shalt know that he hatt measured thy deserts as thou thy self hast measured them.

and his payment shall be as boundless as they!'
"The wish of the servant is the will of his master," an swered Bheemiah, with oriental submission

"So would I have it," returned the Rajah still walking so rapidly that his companion with difficulty maintained his place at his side "Suppose, then," he continued, "suppose, Bheemiah, that even now, by one single deed, onc, on, hat would cost thee small pains in the achievement—ask thyself if thou wert willing to ensure the highest rewards in thy master's gift, and—" the Rajah's voice ellement of the deed of the result of the side of the result of the my?

Bheemiah replied not instandy, in his mind he rapidly surveyed the range of past action that might have created such a fee to him, in that survey he saw but one fearful shadow, and he felt that danger thence was amongst things

Impossible

"I had but one such enemy," he replied slowly, "and my Lord knoweth that he is hidden as in the grave"

Again the Rajah walked on allently The moon had entirely disappeared, and the faces of the two were concealed from each other in that surrounding darkness

The Rajah looked upon the form of his companion, and he cursed the gloom The tongue he trusted rarely, but the eye he knew its language, and believed it.

"Away, indecision and mystery" he said at length
"Bheemiah," and his voice sank into hoarse whisper—

"Bheemiah, and his voice sank into hourse whisper-"Bheemiah, thy betrayed master is at hand?"

The traitor stood lightning struck

"All the gods forbid!" he cried "my lord my master, knowest thou this and are we dallying here?"

"Whither wouldst thou Bheemiah?" said the Rajah, laying his hand on his companion, whose steps already retreated "Tremble not, slave" he continued angrily, "or, by Siva, thou shalt have cause"

The panic of the traifor was gone, self-collected, he again awaited the prince's address

"Dost thou deem me the besotted fool to laugh away in revel a whole day like this," resumed the Rajah, "If aught of danger threatened me? All is safe as yet, Bheemiah, and by thy hand all must be maintained in safety"

"Will the prince deign to instruct his servant?" said Bheemiah, gathering confidence as the danger appeared

less imminent

"Thou knowest," said the Rajah, "that despite our bounty, the army is ripe to revolt. The people—thou hast reported their discontent, the very name of Upoolah would be a war cry that would gather them to his standard from every village in Berar therefore, when I tell the Upoolah is here—nay, start not t—dost thou not see that unless he depart speedly, one treacherous whisper of the base slave who feeds him, may raise a host to crush thy master and thyself?

I Depart m exclaimed Bheemiah in alarmed surprise, "but how? but whither? Where is the single spot of earth that may not suffice to bear his standard? Nay, better he were here "

"Or better that—he perished!"

There was silence 'At length the Rajah spoke again.
"The work must be done, and thou must do it. Bhee mlah'—he must die! It boots not now to tell thee how he fell into my lure, sufficient that I have sworn by Gunga my hand shall not harm him, thine, therefore, unfettered by the oath, must do it' Thy wisdom will discern how altogether impossible it is to trust such a feed to a mercenary slave, whose next breath betrays it thou alone, Bheemiah, art he in whom all things concur to render thee the fit agent thy fear of his future revenge, thy hope of honour and office at my hand—for to what mayst thou not aspire!—all call on thee to shed his blood! It is but a blow —a moment—and 'its done! But, that thou mayest hesitate no longer, I will show but to thee now, even as he sleeps Follow me, but speak not."

Silently Bheemith pursued the footsteps of the Rajah along the rampart, they descended, and, advancing to the centre of the garden, entered one of those smooth paved walks that seem made for pleasure alone, a bowne terminated it, and the Rajah commenced his descent into its depths by the broad flight of stairs which run up one of its sides.

Bheemiah followed with a quailing heart. Beyond the influence of the faint light which scarcely rendered the entrance visible, the physis below was enveloped in the profoundest gloom Far, far above, the stars were shining out in unsulted splendour, and once or twice, in unfathom able depths, it seemed that the brightness of the shining planets above them was reflected from some transparent surface there. The Raigh at length diverged to the right. and entered a small opening which a faint light from with in rendered visible to Bheemiah In the passive obedience of terror still he followed, and it seemed, as he contempla ted the scene on which he suddenly entered that he was under the influence of some potent spell The apartment, for such it was, though low, was spacious, and rich carpets from the loom of Persia covered its pavements, and silken drapery curtained its walls Ottomans of the same costly material invited to repose, the odour of perfumes was in haled at every breath, and a banquet of fruits and rich sweetmeats, and ruby coloured draughts, such as are drunk by the infidel, in vases of the precious metala seem ed to invite them to partake And through the painted curtain that veiled a distant door, he saw small forms floating in glittering drapery, and ever and anon a soft voice arose like gentle music, breathing through silence and darkness "Taste the banquet," said the Rajah, "and fear nothing This spot is devoted to thy master's plea sures, anon, thou shall see that dedicated to his passions"

They feasted there, that sovereign and his alave, and they quaffed the justious wines, as though they would im bihe thence courage for the deed which was to be done The Rajah, more inured to such indulgence than his guest. watched calmly and collectedly the kindling of Bheemiah's eye and brow At the precise moment, shen the voice of the tempter might lead to acts of designation, he arose He took a small lamp from a unche. "The have no time for words," said he, "once more, follow me."

Bheemlah arose, scarcely conscious of the object of such mandate He obeyed, however, and, passing outwards, he found himself again in darkness, for the feeble light the Rajah carned was not visible on the sudden transition from the splendour within They resumed their descent, and Bheemiah felt the aur blow cold and damp upon his brow, as he gradually sank deeper and more deep beneath the upper earth Still his heart trembled not, for his pulse throhbed high under unusual excitement, and with an unfaltering footstep he tracked his guide as he diverged to the left, and entered, through a low and vaulted passage a damp cell, in whose vapours the flame of the lamn scarcely survived, and where, but for that feeble light, all had been dark as the sepulchre it seemed

The Rajah paused, and lowered the lamp "Look at thy feet, Bheemah," said he, "and tell me, who hes there ?"

Bheemiah obeyed He started back of horror escaped his lips

"The avenger or the victim, which?" said the Raiah. in a whisper, that sounded in the ears of Bheemiah like thunder in the mountains

There he lay who had been monarch of that fair territory, he whose from had once sealed the fate of thousands. whose smile had gladdened as many hearts,-he, the mighty, lay there, manacled in the trannings of a slave! And still he slept

"Do thy work quickly," whispered the Raigh, as he placed a dagger in the hand of Bheeminh . "Be wise, and he shall wake no more "

Under the domination of that superior will, the traitor raised his arm At that instant the eye of the victim open ed, and glared upon his murderer-in the next, the up lifted darger had entered his heart.

" He is dead " said the Rajah, ere yet Bheemiah fully comprehended that the deed was done "So perish all our enemies in

They stood again in the open air, and Bheemiah gasped for freer breath The Rajah grasped his arm "By Gun ga, I swore that my hand should not be raised on him whom thou hast slain, and that I have not violated my vow, testify thou, Bheemlah But, traitorous dog, why hast thou betrayed thy master's blood? To thee, at least, he had done no wrong, and, therefore, the more art thou accursed! Base slave, witness that I put no confidence in traitors, but ensure thy fidehity-thus!

The body of Bheemiah reeled and fell into the abyss Once-twice-thrice-there was an echoing sound, as of heavy substances in contact, a plunge, a gurgling of parting waters, and thea naught but silence and death

LE VRAI N'EST PAS TOUJOURS LE VRAI-SEMBLABLE.

WHATER was the second son of a German baron of six teen quarterings. Nothing perhaps could have counter acted effectually the Baron's pride of plunging into the un fathomable aby ss of genealogy, in the deoths of which lay his own antiquity of origin but the symptoms of approach ing starvation, which the empty butteries and unroofed gal leries of his dilapidated ancestral castle exhibited His chil dren got into bad society for the sake of keeping off the two fiends cold and hunger, they put themselves so far on a level with the yeomen and cotters as to take a seat almost daily at the board of some one of them Tho baron snuff ed the air I ke a disdainful steed and looked too high to see their offence. How he contrived to exist, was an enigma that might have puzzled Edipus and as our bust ness with him extends only to the fact of his being the fa ther of our friend Wilmer we shall consign him to the care of his trusty butler gardener, valet, cook housemaid and purveyor-one mu tifarious personage who had the char acter of making as free with the neighbouring flocks poul tri yards, barns. Ac as the owners themselves and in fact enjoyed the fame of being the most successful and ad venturous peculator that had ever been known in Germa ny which is an assertion of no very ordinary magnitude

Precisely at the same epoch there was living and fatten ing on the good things of this world a person who united in himself every characteristic most decidedly opposite to those which distinguished the baron, nevertheless these contrasts were the children of the same parents. How and why the younger should have emigrated from the neigh bourhood of Stratsburg to London—how he prospered there, and attained wealth and its concomitant, influence, it is not necessary to inquire here. The haron s dignith and in former days, cut the connexion, but the haron's poverty was too glad to renew it when a provision for his unfriended sons was a matter of inevitable necessity

Probe affected to make condutions as to the mode in which wealth was to contribute aid, and stipulated for gentlity The old merchant and director, compassioning his own blood, as he said, overlooked the presumption of the stipulation—adopted his nephew and namesake, Frederick, to his particular favour and especial patronage—sent him as a preliminary measure to the University of Halle, and at nineteen embarked him for India, with the credentials of an artillery cadetiship

And what did Frederick acquire during his few years of academic his? The classics, perthaps "-or moral or natural philosophy" -or-but why waste time in conjecture? He learned love and mysteism, and which had the greater share in transforming the hardy, robust moun tainer into a pale, meliancholy, shadowy looking young man, it might puzzle a metaphysician to determine

Sophia Sternhof lived just opposite the lodgings of Fred erick's great and kind friend, Professor X— No man was a more devout Kantean than the excellent professor, but he ate and drank like a materialist So, whilst he slept after dinner, Wilmer occasionally diverted himself by gazing at his ris d ris neighbour, because all study, he argued-though it be the fascinating knowledge of transcen dentals-requires relaxation Perhaps the fine display of roses and other flowers in the opposite balcony was his first attraction no matter-there was cause and effect, and very soon Wilmer saw amongst those flowers only the combination of all their graces in Sophia All the world knew that Madame Sternhof was a cripple, her misfortune was the result of a long attendance on this only child dur ing a very severe and threatening malady the was a widow, and she was poor, -her circumstances and her malady conduced equally to her seclusion Sonhia was never to be seen in the places of public resort, she was a violet blooming the more sweetly for the shade that im bosomed her, for she caught only the first and the last rays of the sun in retired walks before Madame Sternhof rose in the morning, or during her afternoon's siesta

Sophia was a German, but her features and complexion were not national. She had the darksthaur and eyes, an oral face, features of Grecian outline and a fair pale cheek, resulting perhaps as much from confinement and circum stance as from constitution. She was tall, but her perfect proportions give her figure the most feminine elegance, and her stip was hight and sight like. She was often occupied monogst the roses of her balcony, and though at first she retired, on perceiving to what point the intense gaze of the student was directed, she became used to it at length, and, in short, it was not long before he walked by her side during her evening airings, and a few months were sufficient to plunge them into the depths of o pure and first attachment

We might linger here, in this holiest sanctuary of life's best feelings, but sketchers must pass rapidly over the most beautiful details, to bring oot the stronger and more marked features of the picture Wilmer's attachment acquired much of its peculiar character from those pursuits to which it acted as light to shade Sophia's mind was of a lofty tone, and responded to the enthusiasm of his own She delighted to participate in his visionary theories of the soul, and to plunge with him into conjectures of the un known world of phantasm and shadow. But her emoyment in the inquiry differed widely from his She was too much occurred with the every-day business of life-the details of domestic economy, and tender ottendance on her sick parent to find that pienitude of leisure which might have given these speculations a more forcible character She was always under a counteracting influence, and amused herself with these illusions of fancy, as with a beau tiful noem or romance that might touch her heart, or affect her imagination, without warping her reason But Wilmer's mind had not o refuge in this counteraction philosophy, if we are to instate him in calling it by that name, mingled with his love, ond his love encouraged the mysticism of his philosophy, both had a characteristic of melancholy grandeur, for he viewed the soul of her he loved as connected with that my sterious and eternal future. into which human thought pierces only to tremble this was the current of his life

But existence was only to be dreamed away for a short bernod. He must rouse and beath inmedif—inche he part in the actions of mankind, and like a sleeping sailor suddenly summoned to his post on the deck, must encounder with his fellows the united influence of wind, wave, and dalkness.

The Lombard street Wilner required the immediate presence of list nephew in London "The neadeship await ed his arrival, and—and in short the one great conviction on the mind of Frederick was—thousands of leagues of land and ocean were about to divide him from Sophia—forever!

Yes, forever! In his despair, the distance and the time seemed extended beyond humao calculation. It was in finity—it was eternity—a fature of darkness, whether in life or death, mysterious and unknown.

He did, for a moment, indulge the wish, the hope, that

Sophia vould accompany hun to the far off world for which be was destined. One word from her was sufficient to routh that single blooming hope—to break that one line of light. Could she desert her mother?—render the widow childless?—the poor destinite?—the infirm helpless? Wilmer hated himself that he had asked such a sacrifice, a thousand yows were exchanged, hours of pain and agony west away, and they parted.

Sophia had a certain round of duties to perform, which compelled a diversion from the one dominant idea, that at first threatened to become too exquisitely painful for endurance But poor Wilmer was delivered over to the monotony of a five months' abiding on the weary world of waters The novelty of the routine of a ship life-the won ders, to his inexperienced eye, of nautical managementfurnished some occupation for the few first days, put as the vessel neared the line, when the frame was relaxed by the heat, and the mind, by inoccupation, left to prey upon itself, his curiosity was satisfied, and on overwhelming feeling of desolation threw a deeper shade of dreamness over the interminable ocean around him. Some of his companions were coarse and uncultivated, some profligate Others were educated indeed, but they had no sympathies with Wilmer's peculiar modes of thinking and feeling, and with that shrinking delicocy of mind which plunges its possessor into solitude, and sometimes into misanthropy, he believed that by shunning intimacy he escaped ridicule Thus secluding his peculiar pursuits in the sanctuary of his own bosom, he surrendered himself to their enjoyment with passionate ardour, and enshrined amongst them the image of Sonhia, which illuminated the temple with its own light-beautiful and poetical, if pale and melancholy

Ao man ever pussessed more miense consciousness of mellectual existence, or more devout faith in the apirutual peopling of the regions of air around him. The sails white and shrould kie, under the midnight mon, seemed like the tall spectres of the deep, the very waves, as they rolled on in their might, appeared to him heaving beneath the foot steps of beines of power and intelligence beyond that of man. The desire of penetrating the future, common to all mankind, was intense in such a temperament as Wilmer's He saw omen and produjey in the shapeless clouds, to him pictures shadowing forth the unknown, through a hich he was hereafter to pass. Melancholy blended with all his visions. He shaped images of wo in every phantasm of his imagination, and, as a friend said of him afterwards, his mind seemed to awake only at midnight, and to be torpid beneath the enhvering mibence of the sun.

2. cmivening robusings of the

The most that preceded his landing, he passed on deck. It was the full moon, and the whole atmosphere was filled with its beautiful light, brilliant beyond the experience of the travellers in more northern latitudes. Sometimes soft white clouds sailed across the sky, slowly and solemnly as if. Wilmer thought, they were moving to the music of a death anthem His soul was impatient of the restraints of mortality, and strained after the knowledge of mysteries hereafter to be revealed. As the dreamer gazed upwards, he saw a white but dense cloud rising from the west, like a shadow darkening the horizon It came slowly unwards. and as it neared the zenith, it broke into a hundred lesser bodies, which, to his eye, assumed human form and likeli-He saw, drawn out in long array, a funeral procession, he watched it as it moved slowly onwards, and as he gazed, seeming to bimself sensible of its near approach, it dissolved, and the whole arch was one clear, unsulbed sheet of blue and brightness He rose hastily, in the fear of a supernatural presence, and he felt it borne on his mind strongly and irresistibly, that he had witnessed the burnal of his beloved

How far a youth so gifted, and so be wildered by poetted fancies, was qualified to sustain a part in Indian life, where all worldly wisdom is honoured, and all enthusiasm scorned unutterably, those can best tell who have had fatal experience of the depressing effects of that life on the intellect. He was sent to a corps, where for many months he had no companions, and where, too late, he found a real

friend

His correspondence with Sophia was punctual, but then a weary year must clapse before he could receive her answer to each letter. He loved her fervently, ardently as ever. But his mind was devouring itself. Beyond the reach of access to books, satated with his own himted store, not only indifferent, but actually averse to field sports, easier nece became daily less tolerable, and he fill into guilt to avoid the horrors of that Boneliness which threatened him with the crave.

How a man of cultivated mind and high endowments can descend to a tie with a female whose manners heart, every thing, contain the elements of all that, in theory, most dis-

gusts him, is one of those effects

— 'In which the burden of the mystery Of all this named gable world'

is, perhaps, felt most bitterly. It is true, Orissa had exceeding beauty, and the grace of form peculiar to Indian women, to attract the senses There was no saspicion of impurity attached to her till now, she was the orphan of a deceased Subdar, and perhaps Wilmer viewed her as one whom he himself had despoiled. Was he happy in his new connexion? Let him answer who, not yet lost to virtue, has foully wronged the one confiding and faithful heart that has tristed its sum of happiness to his keeping, and lives hopefully, if not bappily, in the conviction of his unswerung falelity.

Pain, acute and remorseful, mingled with his expectation of Sopha's letters. There was even a feeling, unacknowledged perhaps to his own heart, a feeling of relief, if they came not. And yet "the had not forgotten his first love." All the worthy tenderness of his heart was fully engrossed by her, but he know in what he had offended, and he shrank from the close contemplation of the difference between her heart and his, which those letters of pure and devoted affection forced on him

The brightness of Sophia's prospects in Germany had not increased since they parted "My dear mother," she wrote in one of her letters, "grows weaker daily Every morning I think I perceive a diminution of health in her countenance, and the accents of her voice falter when she blesses me Ah, if it would please God to spare my dear parent to me, I would regret your absence less, Frederick, than I have been wont to do The secret repining of my heart at our separation, was indeed greater than I ever cared to confess to you, and the fading colour of my poor mother's cheek is a painful reproach to me If she does but regain some portion of her health, I will indeed strive to bear with more fortitude a sorrow which I fancy I have bitherto cherished Indeed, dear Frederick, I felt as if to be happy, were treason to you, and approached to forgetfulness As if your Sophia could forget! Oh, no, neither of us can forget how dear we have been to each other! how dear we are ' But do not let the thought of me ever cause you one paioful moment. Rather take comfort in remembering that there exists one being, whose highest earthly hope is that she will one day, far distant as it may be, find her felicity in contributing to yours" in Dearrest Frederick," sand another letter, "I have been long without writing to you, and I scarcely know why I should write now I have tried to hide what! feel, and almost think it wrong to cast the shadow of my graff over your path. But indeed, Frederick, I feel my utter loneliness so planfully, that I am driven to write to you as the only refuge from the sorrows that oppress me I know that I am constantly in the myful presence of death, and if the blow be not already dealt be to not the less near. This is an auful at thought, dear Frederick 1 and 1 seem; much er's face pale as it has shadow lay on it. My dear, dear nother, why did I ever greev when my heart could enter tain a reasonable hope of your being spared to me for years? Why did any other thought ever cause me a sigh or a tear? I often dwell on the conversations we used to hold together, Frederick, perhaps we were wrong in en deavouring to penetrate into mysteries beyond this sphere of existence, further than has been revealed. It is a deark and awful valley that separates life from death, and what matters it to us whether it be peopled, and with what? I am indeed, not happy, I seem always to hear the thunder, and to be within reach of the lighting."

"The stroke has fallen," she wrote again "You will grieve for me, my dearest mother died three months since You will not wonder that I have not written before, indeed I have not had the heart to do so, it seemed to me a trea son to her memory to think of any subject connected with But now, I come to you for advice and direction, which our engagement and our affection gives me a right to ask, and you a right to afford You know the small in come on which we formerly subsisted was only a pension for my mother's life-consequently, now it is withdrawn, and the little fund she so earefully accumulated for me, together with the produce of our household furniture, will afford me the means of existence only during a few There is, therefore, but a choice of dependence do you point out such a mode in which my exertions shall be made as will be least disagreeable to you. My cousin, the banker's wife, at Leipzig, has written to offer me the advantage of her protection, as instructress to her five children I am going to her directly, and shall await your reply there I do not think any plan could be more accept able to you than this, and you will be comforted by know ing that, if I be dependent, it is on my own kinswoman Besides, life is not all roses"

"Lyfe is not all rose?" sughed. Wilmer, as he finished the last letter. The death of Airs. Sterabof affected him parfully, but the disposal of Sophia was a much more interest ing point to be considered. The irres coable past was be youd his power, and he set himself seriously to decide on his views for the future

Amidst all the difficulties of the situation in which folly and frailty had placed him, let it not be supposed that Wilmer for a moment hesitated on deciding that his union with Sophia should be effected with all possible speed. Arey little exheultation sufficed to show, how much less expensive and difficult her coming out to India immediately would be, than his returning to England for the purpose of escorting her. If he were indeed able to obtain a year's furlough on "urgent private affairs," he would draw no pay during that period, and the must incur a large debt to defray his contingent expenses, whereas, it would not be difficult to borrow a sum sufficient for Sophia's outfit, which, by severe economizing during the interval of the passage of his letter to England, and her voyage out, he felt confident he should be able to repay before her arm val. This plan wis carried into instant execution,—the money after some demurs on the part of agents, procured by effecting an insurance of his life, and despatiched with an invitation ardient, pressing, and, as appeared from the result irresustable.

Thus far Wilmer's plan had navanced rapidly and easily to execution. But by far the most difficult task remained, he felt it imperative on him, by honour, principle, even including the property of the prope

Wilmer had been absent about a fortnight when he re ceived the following letter from Captain Aubrey —

"My bear Wilmer,

"In the first place let me relieve your mind by telling you, you are free The gurl has left your house forever, I trust I have disposed of a sum in her behalf, which will produce her ten rupees a month for her hife, put out to usury after the native fusion. This will be done by an agent over whom I shall be ulways able to keep an eye, for, sub intents sit, be belongs to the troop, and depend on it, if there is any failure in punctuality on his part, we shall hear of it.

"I need not relate to you all my arguments and persuasions, because to me 'nothing so tedious as a twice told tale'. You may imagine the violence of a native woman, and the superior energy of her language, which, you know, is on no occasion limited by the restraints of common decency. She threatens you with all manner of evil and vengeance, and I hear she was making poora at the Swamme house on the left of our lines, a few nights since, to call down mischief and punishment on you There is one point on which you may set your mind at ease Hall recognised her when she visited my verandah the otner day, he swears she hved with Jones of the 81st before she was fourteen, he spoke to her, and she received him with all the ease of an old acquaintance Her father, it is true, was a Subidar, but a Pariah, he got his promotion in days of yore, when we looked less to a Sepoy's caste than now, -so, you see, she had no caste to violate In every respect you are well rid of her, for setting aside the superior beau ty of her nerson, she is one of the worst of her species I ever happened to meet.

"You have suffered so much on account of this unhappy affair, that your own mind has already suggested more admonitions than my lazy pen is likely to afford you Se riously however, my dear Wilmer, unfavourable as I con sider life in this country to a young man's intellectual ad vancement this inconvenience becomes nothing when I regard the infinitely more serious depravity which it has a tendency to produce in his moral character. Viewing crimes of this kind as, if evil necessary, his moral sense very soon becomes so obtuse that a violation of the holiest sanctions of civilized society may come to be regarded by him in the light of a venial offence Besides, if no worse result were to be feared, the intimate association with be ings, the degradation, the refuse of their sex-having noth ing of woman but the form-must have an irresistible ten dency to brutify the heart and destroy the understanding I wish no cadet came out before he was twenty, and every one married If I had a voice in the legislature, I would vote to establish it by Act of Parliament

"I have concluded, you see, with an opinion worthy of a married man However, as I hope soon to greet you a member of the fratermty, I need not apologize for sentiments, the justice of which I think you will at this moment

most particularly approve

' Ever, my dear Wilmer. "Yours most sincerely. "C AUBREY

"P S I forgot, as usual, to give you Mrs Aubrey's best salam I know she feels more than usually well disposed towards you just now, in the prospect of your providing her with a suitable companion -G O in yesterday ways reduction t If the system goes on, we may content ourselves with curry and rice, for we shall get nothing beyond it. It would not become me, in my position of commandant, to give evil counsel, otherwise I almost think I should advise a mutiny "

Wilmer was well satisfied that he had thus finally shaken off the trammels of his culpable connexion, but he felt some of those uncomfortable magazings, if I may call them so, which invariable attend the commission of wrong. He resolved to remain absent during the whole of his two months' leave, trusting that, the habit of separation once

fixed, he should escape future annovance

He returned at length, with a thankful but not a poyful heart Solitude was always unfavourable to a tempera ment so predisposed to melancholy, and an intellect whose favourite exercises were in the most mysterious depart ment of human conjecture. Capitain Aubrey, surpecting something of the nature of his pursuits and sincerely anx tous for his happiness with all the frankness of Indian hospitality, offered him the closest intimacy in his domestic orcle. Wilmer's burgalow was in the adjoining compound and after this period he became in fact an immate at his french's

With the pertuncity which distinguishes these unhappy creatures, the discarded woman sometimes found means of approaching Wilmer. In his solitory morning's walk she occasionally presented herself before him with prostration and tears, and all that is in fact 'part of the voca tion' of her class. But when Wilmer, by repeated resist nace, proved himself mulnerable, and resigned his early sauntering abroad, her attacks assumed a different character, she came boldly to his house with threals, volence, and outcries—calling down vengeance, and menacing him with the infliction of it. Captain Aburey's interference was, at first, ineffectual, and it was not until the withdrawing of her strend for two or three months that she facilities.

of her stipend for two or three months that she finally re treated, and left Wilmer to comparative tranquility The succeeding interval was, however, one of great anx lety Prone always to view the future as approaching in nety Prone always to view the future as approaching in clouds and darkness, the heart of Wilmer was often over whelmed with doubt and anguish. He heatstated to admit the behef that Sophia would indeed have courage to ven ture unprotected on a voyage to this distant land. He feared the opposition of her relation, and even if all these obstacles were finally overcome, he dreaded the effect this uncongenial climate might have on a constitution naturally decicate. If futh must be told, his most intimate presages were all of evil, but their shape was indistinct as the sha dow that is minging with surrounding gloom. The strong common sense, the raillery, and the constant society of Captam Aubrey, the kindness and good feeling evinced by his wife, and his being led as much as possible to the most onlivening amusements the place afforded, were, how ever, effectual in preserving generally the equipose of his

At length one cause of doubt and agitation was removed

He received a letter from Sophia

"Yes, I am indeed coming to you, dear Frederick, but I on not know that I should have wentured on such as step, uninfluenced by the representations, I may add, the community of my relation S Be advocates the measure on the grounds that you urge it—the saving of expense However, I will not now fell you every argument that has been advanced, I write this from London, as the date and the postmark will fell you, having been conveyed hither by my relation's brother and agent in this great metropolis I may consider, therefore, that my voyage has already commenced, since I have quitted my country. By passages is taken on board the —— which sails early in next months. To consider the description of the control of the control

"I bring with me, dear Frederick, a heart unchanged in warm affection to you, but, at present, and and despond ing. You will not find my person improved, but if you libink me paler and thinner, you will remember that I have passed through some suffering since we parted, and will not love me less for the change. I own, however, that I wish we had once met again, and at least resumed our acquaintance "

"Ah, how well I can understand that feeling poor grill" said Mrs Aubrey, to whom ertracts of Sophia's letter were read. Pleased with the simplicity, purity, and affection those extracts expressed, Mrs Aubrey became more deepy interested in the future bride of her friend, and prepared for her reception with a consideration that regarded equality the feelings of Sophia, and the estimation to be obtained for her from the world

Captan Aubrey had a brother at the presidency, and he and his excellent wise found it particularly expedient at they should wist him just at this juncture, so that, as they told Wilmer, they should be able to afford Sophia protection and a home immediately on her landing. By this means also, they suggested, he would be spared the necessity of applying for leave, and incurring the additional expense of the journey.

Wilmer felt-how deeply did he feel t-this real kindness

Impatient as he was to greet his Sophia, he was conscious of all the additional respectability that would attend his umon, if she were received by Mrs. Aubrey, and made the journey to his present station in her society and under her protection. Lover like longings were not for a moment to he put in competition with these solid advantages, and gladly, gratefully, he testified his assent.

They departed, Captain Aubrey and his family, and never had solitude seemed to Wilmer so sad, or time so tedious, Reading was out of the question, and he had few compan-Of those few, the want of intelligence was more opparent than ever, never had the chiate appeared so ter rible, the country so unolluring; but even suspense, oll-lin gering as it is, and slow as are its haunted footsteps, must cease: Wilmer received a letter from Mrs Aubrey

"The --- carne in sight the evening before last; yester day morning her passengers disembarked, and amongst them, Aubrey g eeted, on the deck of the ship, your Sophia.

"For once, love has not exaggerated, she is indeed beau-tiful, graceful, simple, attractive expect many rivals You know, a new face in India, that is barely tolerable, is a great attraction, and this creature, we may be quite con vinced, will have some of our dignitaries at her feet with all possible despatch If her mind prove equal to the idea conveyed by her entire manner, you have nothing to fear from the glittering temptation, and, perhaps, hereafter you may find a cause of happiness in her having been exposed to it. However, Aubrey will not leave the presidency—can yea forgive him?—until the monsoon is fairly over; that is to say, at the expiration of three entire months"

Wilmer chd feel it hard to endure this "hope deferred." even whilst, he acknowledged the wisdom and real kindness that r rompted his friend's designs; he had, however, too much virtue, and, perhaps, too little courage, to offer any opporation, and he remained solitary whilst those three months were hugeringly oway

It must be confessed his patience was rewarded by frequent lett ers from Sophia. those letters were indeed so delightful, that it may be doubted if he did not secretly acquiesce in the sentiment, that it is worth while to separate from the objects of attachment, to experience the exquisite pleasur a derivable from their correspondence

Soph is came through the orderl pure and unsulfied by one reigret that she was the destined bride of a subaltern We pr iss over the splendid temptations offered to her, and see hear at length safely domesticated with Aubrey, at the head quarters of his troop, and enjoying daily the society of W ilmer

The day of their minon was fixed, and it was a week distint, every anxiety seemed baushed from the heart of Sophia, in the fulness of her present happiness. There was the deep and lixurious repose that succeeds inmile and extreme agitation, her hopes were on the eve of realization, and her wishes seemed bound up in a golden certain ty. Wilmer, too, felt that happiness was all around him, and if sometimes a shade of melancholy did cross his brow, or a thought of sadness his heart, the smiles and tender ness of Sophias speedily restored his tranquility, if they did not excite him to a vivacity with which, in truth, his nature was almost unacquanted.

It was one of those brilliant evenings peculiar to south ern climes, the whole landscape was bathed in the softest and clearest moonlight every object was as distinctly visible in its form as by day, and the absence of colour, the striking contrast of light and shade, gave solemnity to the scene Sonlua and Wilmer had strolled through an ave nue bounded on either side by plantains and guavas, and they now reposed in an open verandah, looking out upon the garden before them, filled with eastern shrubs, and plants, and fruits-the white thatched bungalows speckled around-the clear river, filled with the recent rains, each ripple crested as with a jewel, as it reflected back the moon's ray, and if they sighed at contrasting the oriental character of the scene with their own European home, they felt likewise that they were together, and wished not, asked not, for change

Abbrey and his wife joined them, and they conversed playfully Wilmer, for once, seemed to deliver himself up entirely to happiness, he was unusually cheerful, and when Mrs Aubrey afterwards dwelt on that evening she confessed that Wilmer was so unlike himself, that his vivacity had impressed her mind with a pain almost like an acute

pang inflicted on her body

By degrees Sophia became less animated, but us the others were conversing with great eagerness her complete abstraction was not affired precived Wilmer was the first to be conscious of it, and, looking in her face, his own reflected back its extreme paleness.

"Heavens Sophia, you are very ill"

He clasped her hands in his They were cold and damp Mrs Aubrey, roused by his evident alarm, rose also "My dear Sophia, what is the matter?"

"I do not know, —I cannot tell, —it was a sudden pang, —a faintness, —a humbness, a—a—Wilmer' oh, Wilmer'; and she fell back in his arms

Wilmer was nearly as powerless as his fainting bride.

Aubrey took her in his arms and carried her into the house He exchanged a look with his wife, that revealed at once all he knew, and all he feared The nature of the attack was not to be mistaken

Medical aid was almost instantly administered Wilmer, scarcely conscious of any thing that was occurring, paced the garden, with his hands pressed on his brow, gazing upwards with his burning eyes, sensible of pain and anguish, but bewildered wherefore and why

There were symptoms not to be mistaken, but there were others as inexplicable "What I can comprehend of this case," said the surgeon to Mrs Aubrey, "threatens nothing fatal, but there are symptoms apparent that lead me to suspect the illness of our patient to have been produced by causes purely external. Has she eaten any thing unusual—any thing more than is generally on your table?"

"Nothing I remember nothing," said Mrs Aubrey, dreadfully agitated, 'surely, surely, doctor, you suspect nothing very-that is-"

"We must endeavour to ascertain what has been taken," he returned, evasively "I will see Wilmer, perhaps he may be able to elucidate what, I confess, embarrasses me"

It was some minutes before Wilmer could be made to comprehend the nature of the questions asked by the sur geon. At length he said he had brought her some bon bons, in the manufacture of which one of his servants was very skifful, that Sophia had frequently before eaten them, without any bad effect, and in larger quantities, for she had reserved a great portion of these for the children

Doctor V desired to see what remained

When they were produced, he examined several closely and minutely "Send for your boy," said he to Wilmer,

"I wish to ask him a question"

But the boy was no longer to be found, and now that discovery seemed at hand, as is usual with natives of this class, each individual of Wilmer's household had something to disclose of the absentee, which had never before been suspected

He had been Wilmer's favourite attendant, his dressing-boy—always about his person. It now appeared that he had also been so high in the favour of the unfortunate and guilty woman, formerly living with Wilmer, that it was no secret to his fellow-servants that he was her paramour

Moreover, it was ascertained, that she had, for several days, been lurking in the neighbourhood of Wilmer's compound,—that Mootasawny had had repeated interviews with her,—and that, on one occasion, he had gone to sleep before his master's return from Captain Aubrey's at night, being intoxicated,—that before he slept he had talked strangely, and rad told them, "never any good when mistress come,—better not let come,—master good, quet gentleman,—what for mistress want?—notlet come?

The evidence was more than sufficient to corroborate the suspicions of Dr V He was quite sure that some nox ious drug or herb had been administered, and with inex messible grief he was obliged to confess that the disease was beyond the power of his art.

Wilmer admitted the conviction in all its depth of dark ness and of horror. Sophawas dying, and link by link he traced the chain of the tragedy to the first moving causehis own guit. He was very calin—so calim that no opposition was made to his being present by the dying couch of Sophia.

The face was fearfully changed, the whole frame was collapsed in a degree that seemed the effect of years of disease, rather than of a few minutes. She smiled gently when she became conscious that Wilmer was near, but generally she lay in a state of quiet, resembling forpor

Her hand lay m his-passive and cold as if already that of a corpse, except when a convolisive pressure, and a correspondent contraction of feature, indicated a spasm of pain Towards the last, her eye gained an expression of strong consciousness. She looked around at Mrs Aubrey—at Aubrey—and smiled peacefully and gratefully. That air, and intellectual eye looked more brightly and tenderly than ever, as it poured its glance of parting love on the one being who had excited the first—the last passion of her pure beart. The lips moved, but "Hitmer I" was scarcely audible. His arms encreled her in an instant. His check rested against hers, he left her breath pass sighingly over 1, and the spuri of Sophia had departed!

As soon as possible, after a long and dangerous illness, Wilmer went to Europe on sick certificate, his kinsman was dead, and had bequeathed to him a moderate competence, which enabled him to dedicate himself to the prodund retirement he covered. In a small house at Halle, once occupied by Madame Sternhof, lived, years afterwards, a melancholy han, generally considered manen, at once shunning and shunned. The poor were well acquainted with him and his haunts, but, though he was suspected of an over great acquaintance with books, he was unknown both to the rich and the learned. His only attendant was the nurse of Sophia, whose fidelity, life trust ed her, was involable, for he was never betraved. He was found dead one morning in a little arbour, the erection of which was well known to have been a favourite amusement to Sophia Sternhof, "who had gone far away" He was burted in the adjacent churchyard, in the corner shaded by the large and pale ash tree, where no headstone records his name, his misfortunes, or his crimes

LETTER FROM CALCUTTA.

"My DEAR K----

'Beson me very safely deposited,—after sondry toss ings by land and water by the combined efforts of pa lankeen bearers boatmen, and the wind,-in my own gar den house, on the banks of the broad and brilliant Ganges .- once again a suburban of the city of palaces In spite of your well remembered hospitality. I look back with out regret on the moment of my departure from your tongue ned .- that is, press ned .- Presidency I eat my breakfist with keener zest now it is accompanied by some Journal, in which men dare declare boldly that which the charter of their birth commands them to think You know this involves the subject of a long standing controversy between us, but now that I have again planted my foot beneath the shadow of comparative liberty,-hugging its blessings to my bosom,-I challenge you to show me one single bad consequence resulting from a press in Calcutta as unfettered as any reasonable man could desire On the contrary, are not its benefits exhibited in the improved tone of society,—the dawning cultivation of indigenous talent,—the absence of many evils which have been brought by this medium to the notice of those within whose power lay redress,-and with whom to perceive has been to re more? Trust me, old Indian as I am, and knowing as I do the delicacy and frangibility of those links by which society is here, in an especial manner, holden together, none less than I would advocate the degradme of the public press into a vehicle by which mean and malignant minds might, under anonymous shelter, inflict those wounds for which their swords are all too rusty Not thus! Sacred forever be the sanctuary of private life -uninvaded the territory of each man's hearth stone! But the actions of public servants are public property, and no man holds office ex empt from this condition The press, therefore the organ of the public, has the right of stamping them with the brand of shame, or crowning them with the laurel coronal, as is meetest for their deservings Wo to the ruler who dreads the truth from the tongue of an honest man, and seeks his security in the insane impolicy of a gagt Your press is a blot on your society, which spreads o shade of darkness over the whole surface Its servinty is despicable, the original matter of its effusions execuable; its extracts directed by the most partial illiberality On the contrary, here, at present, the press is worthy British editors, and does not disgrace the mother tongue Therefore we ask nothing beyond actual enjoyment, but the security of its the right. We deny that we ought to be nut in the condition of receiving by act of grace, a property fraudulently withholden from us True, that we have no cause to complain under the administration of our present high-feeling and liberal minded governor general, but all governorsgeneral number not these qualities amongst their especial prerogatives We have had woful experience that they ore subject to ull the infirmities that "flesh is heir to." no above all, we dread the short lived but severe desnotism of an interregnum. We feel the pain of old but not forgotten wounds -at changes of weather and similar unpleasant occasions Time, the great "EDAX," will, I trust, set his seythe in this as to many other moun-down prejudices, too long bound upon a finud, shrinking world As to you, you appear to have forgotten the great moral and political truth, that subjects are, at least, as much in fault as rulers. when the one oppresses, and the other groups, indeed, but, whilst he groans, obeys i

"My dear h- I wish you would show yourself amongst us, that you might see with your eyes, and con fess with your lips, that there are choice spirits even in this Indian world,-not by twos and threes, but by dozens and scores There is ____, but no -come and see them bodils .-come, and thenceforward deny that human in tellect does indeed perish here .- that the tone of our society is so grossly sensual os to drive from its sphere all that is intellectual.-all that is affeed to the nobler part of man Tremble not that you shall be conducted to o festal board. for the furnishing forth of which whole herds and flocks have been slaughtered . We order these things better now" There is less of official in the tone of our friendly meeting, and we do not put each other to death if a transgression of the laws of precedence should chance to occur We do not measure our appreciation of men by the date of appointments and commissions, or by the number of units that describe our annual receipts Aous arons change tout cela We respect talent, and we listen to it with atten tion, even if it should wear but the insignia of subaltern ship. We do not think a bit the more highly of a man's virtues or genius, because he writes "honourable" to his name, or holds a province at his beck We are beginning to receive it as an article of faith, that the moral idiosyncrasy of the individual is worth more of our observance than the accidents of his externals We have done with drinking,-and gaming is pronouncing its final imprecations in blushful whispers We read,—we think,—and we publish Conversation, at least, fairly contests the ground with the bubbling, murmaring luliaby, of the sommiferous hookah Our women have got beyond the accidence of female intellect,-the fashion of a new turban, and the piquancy of the last Leadenhall street novel, or hason. Scandal there is,—if not so much or so loud as of yore, still enough to make an honest man bless himself that he is not-woman! We live so much with open doors,-and it requires so little exertion for our neighbour to peep into the arcana of our establishment,-that at idle hours, for such will occur even to the "sensible and reflecting part of the world," we are apt to look, and to communicate the result of our observations "'Is true, 'tis pity, pity 'tis, 'tis true" But as the schoolmaster bath really put on his seven league boots, and looked in on us, we trust that beneath his gentle castigations, this evil also will, in the course of two or three thousand centuries, be pot to death Meanwhile, let us comfort ourselves with what there is of hright in the present.

"A Calcutta RE UNION -Did not you read the account of it in the journals with sparkling eyes, and mouth watering? Did not you picture to yourself, beauty discarding the tawdry ornaments which, for the most part, disfigure her in all public exhibitions—arrayed simplex mundities, and disdaining not to contribute-noble, perchance, and bright as lovely—her quota to the more refined pleasures of the evening 2 Did not your heart yearn to him, the au thor of that pleasant charade, which was acted to the life, by yonder two or three non professing amateurs? And did not your fancy linger on the dying potes of that thrilling syren, who so charmed our listening ear, that even applause was hushed in hope of more-in reluctance to believe that those honey-dropping tones had ceased to fall upon our sense? And did you not desire to catch the sparkling bon-mot, as it added that Attic salt to the light repast, which just sustains, not satiates? Such an assembly, my friend, is choice enough for the most fastidious abhorrence of grossness and sulgarity. It is meet for the choicest epicure of society, and as it does not invite the presence, cares

httle for the censure, of those who ment the cognomen of its cluttons

"Have you seen our New Annual'—No! Then, as I am anxious to contribute largely to your deligh! I shall send you a copy by Bringy Do not you, men of Madras, droop with shame, not only that there is no spirit of emu lation in you, but none of encouragement? that as you are not the Virgils, you are unwilling to become the Macenas es of literature, and that, from want of sufficient patron age, this little star of the Indian press is likely to be seen no more above the horizon? Oh, most worthy and most assume public of ——! But I have done

'I meant to have been descriptive on many and various subjects connected with this lordly capital but I have, at the same time, exhausted my paper and my patience Yours, I guess, is pretty considerably worn out also; therefore, until I am again 'I' the vein,' beheve me, &c. &c. &c.

NOURMAHAL.

A RIGGRAPHICAL SKRTCH.

Amongst the very few females who have sustained a distingu shed rôle in the generally sanguinary drama of Indian History, the name of Nourmahal stands pre-eminent ly conspicuous

Chaia Aiass, by a long course of trials was reduced to the extreme of poverty and misery. His despair assumed a gloomier character as the period approached which was to add another claimant to his affection-another human being to his care, when to the relation of husband he was to add that of father Talent, probity, industry-all were in vain displayed and exerted in his inhospitable native clime In Tartary, as elsewhere, "a prophet hath no hon our in his own country " and deprived of hope-every resource failing-he exchanged the few household articles which remained to him, for such as might best assist and sustain a frugal traveller Accompanied by his wife he left forever the lard of his birth, and with courage to meet, and fortitude to endure the perils and trials of his journey, he commenced the long murch which was to remove him to the more fertile and more adventurous clime of India

Cheerfully the pair proceeded on the earlier part of the journey but before they had completed traif the distance before them the dreadful coaviction smole them, that their stock of provisions, frugally as they had drawn on it, was nearly exhausted, and that famine was likely to overtake them in the inhospitable tract through which they were now passing

Could any thing add to the bitterness of man's feelings, In such a situation-with such a prospect before him? There was yet a single drop to fall into the cup of Chaja Alass,-the moment was at haad which was to make him a faither Overcome with pain and fatigue, his wife had sunk at the foot of a tree, whose friendly branches shel tered her from the sun, and, in agony and suffering, from the contemplation of which Nature shrinks, and the possibility of the endurance of which philosophy might deny,

she became the mother of a hving daughter

The first smile of that child beguiled the mother of the memory of her sufferings Her attachment increased with her strength, fatigoe, privation, want, were remembered no more, "carrying her babe," she saild, "she could march so easily"

The brow of the unhappy Chaja Aiass darkened into unworted steraness Their provisions had reached the lowest ebb, their utmost expedition would not bring them to human habitations before they were completely exhaust ed His write, weak, and still sick, was iil able to bear the additional fatigue of that burden which her maternal fond ness tried to delude itself by pronouncing light. There was no hope that she could affort her baby the sustenanco it required, wearness, want, and weakness, would speedily deprive her of the provision Nature supplies. What was to be done? It was no novel idea to sin Asiato to leave the child exposed beneath the tree under which it was born But the mother! Chala Aiass felt his purposes taken, as he pictured the distress to which it would expose his fellow sufferer—his more than fellow sufferer.

The sun was above the mountains, when the husband, and wrought himself to that pitch of resolution which enables the victim to endure the rack with silent hips, made preparations for their march. His wife, with the child girdled to her side, gross. "You are too weak," said Chadride to the raide, gross. "You are too weak," said Chadride to the raide, gross. "You are too weak," said Chadride to the raide, gross.

ja Aiass, "give me our babe"

She looked in his face, and its darkness fell upon her spirit like sn echipse, a fear—a horror—a full conviction of his lineat, pressed on her. Her despui seemed apathy, as, unresisting and passive, she obeyed his commands The unconscious child lay smiling in his arms

"It must be!" said he, and, as if fearful his resolution should waver he denosited it at the foot of the tree which had been its birth place

"Do not kill it" whispered the mother hoarsely, half un conscious of that which was passing before her Chaia

Aussi looked in her face, it seemed as if death had struck it. Scarcely less cold was his own heart, yet, with the fortifude that marked his whole life, he did not swerve from an act which he beheved necessary, and which, inhappily, in the moral code of his nation, its bardly a crume. He supported his trembling wife, and led her onward.

She yielded to the impulse of his arm, but as she receded

her head was turned back, and her eyes were constantly fixed on the forsaken one Chuja Alass spoke not, consolation would have been mockery from his lips, as to her heart At length the winding of the path shut out the child and the tree which shadowed it,—then, as if first compre hending the whole reality of her desolation, the bereaved mother poured forth the passion of her feelings

Tearing herself from the supporting arm of her husband, she fell at his feet. She dashed her head on the earth in the wild madness of her agony. She supplicated, she menaced, she abjured him by his god, and with dreadful imprecations on herself if she failed to fulfil her yow, she swore never to abandon her child-to remain and perish with it.

The resolution of Chaia Aiass failed His own anguish was awakened into a voice and an expression, by the pas sionate grief of his wife 'Be tranquil" he said, "if the child dies, we will die I will return and bring it"

In an instant her shrieks were hushed. The soft hope of a mother's love flowed back on her heart, and brighten ed through her tears She sat on the ground, her eyes fixed on the receding form of her husband, and when he was no longer visible, on that point of the landscape where he had disappeared, and in her tender longing for the certain presence of her child, she forgot that the storm of desolation had threatened her Chaia Alass meanwhile came in sight of the tree His eye rested on its root, but the object there was strange and incomprehensible It was not his child, it was a mass which in the distance seemed shapeless. With winged steps and a beating heart he approached

Oh, horror !- The child was there, and looked up smilingly even as it lay amin'st the foul folds of a black and loathsome snake, that had writhed its whole length round the sweet body of the babe A wild, loud shrick burst from the breast of Chana Anass. The reptile reared its head '-its folds were rapidly unwound, and in terror of the unseen enemy, it glided amidet the number of the forest

Chaja Alass remained as if rooted to the earth. In his eyes, the flight of the snake, and the safety of his child, were miraculous-the effects of the immediate and supernatural interference of his god Tears fell from his eyes, he raised his child from its dangerous resting place, and with a thousand caresses pouring on its head blessings innumerable, he carried it to the impatient mother

How the miracle was told by Chaja Aiass in terms by no means less exalted than the occasion warranted, and how both wife and husband hailed it as a pledge of the future preservation and ultimate exaltation of the child, may be imagined by all those acquainted with the supersction of people, the half of whose actions are regulated by omens

and auguries

In confirmation of all these high wrought expectations, before their supplies were entirely exhausted, just when fear was verging on appalling certainty, they came up with a party of travellers, who charitably admitted them into their company, and bestowed the aid that had at length become necessary

Without farther difficulty they accomplished their journey to the capital of Akbar Chaia Amss was taken into the service of an Omrah about the court, into whose confidence, his talents, fidelity, and integrity, speedily advanced At length the monarch himself distinguished him. and through various degrees of promotion, he attained the post of treasurer of the empire

Meanwhile, the child so miraculously preserved had been educated by Chara Arass himself, with a care ond ottention immeasurably exceeding that bestowed on eastern women generally Her expansion of intellect, her improvement in the lighter accomplishments, reworded the assiduity, and justified the doting fondness of her father personal beauty as far exceeded that of the generality of women, as her intellectual accomplishments, ond, the fa your extended by Akbar to Chaja Alass rendering his alliance os desirable os the graces of his daughter rendered it attractive, she was betrothed at an early oge to an Omrah of rank and distinction at court.

The Sultan Selim, the son of Akbar, not less than his father favoured Chaja Ajoss Weak in Intellect, indolent, and effeminate, he reposed on the superior mind of the treasurer, with a confidence that spared him all the fatigue of reflection Occasionally he saw the young Nourmahal. and enraptured with her beauty-perhaps also allured by that evident strength of mind which offered aid to his own mertness-he demanded her in marriage, and pledged himself for the gratified concurrence of the emperor - But Nourmahal was betrothed Chara Alass explained his dilemma to the prince, but Selim, sanguine in the success of his passion, engaged that the interference of Akbar would secure the consent of the Omrah himself to the breach of the engagement, and, won by his importunity, influenced also by his ambition to see the daughter fulfil by becoming the wife of the future sovereign, the high des' tiny to which he believed her early and almost miraculous preservation had dedicated her, Chaja Alass consented that Sultan Selim should implore the interference of his royal father

But Akbar was too just to permit the passions of his son

to change the laws of his empire, or to interfere with the customs of his people The wise monarch knew too well his own influence, to be unaware that his interference would be compulsive on his Omrah, and that the mere hint of his wishes being construed into commands, would lead the betrothed bridegroom to yield in submission that to which, if free, he would have maintained his indefeasible right with life The princely lover bore his disappointment with a burning heart, but Chaja Aias applauded the equity of his master's decision, and the marriage of Nourmahal was shortly afterwards completed

Akbar died, and Sehm ascended the throne of Delhi

Selim-or Jehangire, for, on his elevation to the sovereignty, he assumed that magmificent title, signifying "Em peror of the world"-had not forgotten the charms of Nourmahal The sudden crush of his liopes in the moment of fancied attainment, had rendered his passion the more violent, and his resolution eventually to attain his object became the more decided from the silence he was com pelled to observe regarding it

But now, to a monarch all things were easy, and if the ardour of his love was perhaps dissipated in the voluptu ousness of the Zenanah, his desire of regaining that of which he deemed himself wrongfully deprived, and of punishing the Omrah who had been the innocent cause of his disappointment, was the more interise. The husband of Nourmahal was sent, by the express command of the emperor, on a mission so hopeless, that he felt he had received his death warrant The treacherous purpose of Jehangire was answered He deprived himself of a futhful servant, and was avenged on a too fortunate rival

Nourmahal received the tidings of her husband's death with a beating heart Perhaps at this moment her ambition was first awakened, she saw in no distant perspective, her union with Jehangire, and her consequent ascendency in the state Her heart probably was startled at the earliest approach of such imaginings,—shocked thus to shake off the memory of—the murdered Yes, Nourmahal was not for a moment blind to the fact, that the desperate mission on which her husband had been sent, was a snare for his life-and that the disappointed passion of Selim had fired the train for his destruction

Chaja Alass was high in the favour of his monarch. The emperor rehed on the strength of his understanding and the multiplicity of his resources, with all that unquestioning faith which had rendered him the confident and friend th Sultan Selum Still holding the post of Treasurer of the Empire, he was, in fact, in all measures of difficulty the secret counsellor of the emperor, and incomparably the most trusted To him Jehangire first spoke of his wish, that Nourmahal should reside in the palace, and Chaja Arass, whose respect for the memory of the Omrah was probably lost in the prospect of aggrandizement to himself and his family, which the anticipated influence of Nour mahal promised-received "the autimation of his master's wishes, as a law which it became not his servant to dis pute "

With a bounding heart Nourmahal entered the apart ment of the Zenanah which was appropriated to her Vis ions of the enjoyment of unbounded power-the thought that henceforth the fate of a great empire would principally be regulated by her-afforded so much mental occupation for the first few days after her arrival, that she scarcely regretted the absence of the emperor But when weeks passed away, and he made no effort to see her, when she heard of him only as having refused to make that provision for her support which befitted the rank of his sultana -she was for an instant overwhelmed with consternation and dismay But her mind was too haughty to love for any long time the power of grappling with its destiny, and too active to be subdued to torpor She aroused herself, and commenced the assiduous cultivation of those talents in which she was pre eminent

Her exquisite skill in embroidery-her perfect knowledge of painting-were put in requisition to manufacture arti cles of luxury and elegance, the sale of which might afford her the means of decorating her apartment and her person, with all the splendour that befitted her rank did her efforts relax during the years in which Jehangire persisted in his extraordinary resolution. Every day witnessed the creations of her needle and her pencil, vying with each other only in brilliancy and beauty-at once the ornament and admiration of the whole court

It was perhaps quite consistent with the weakness of Se hm's character, that the complete attainment of his object -the removal of the Omrab, and the possession of Nour mahal-should diminish ur annihilate his desire for it. All obstacles having disappeared, the prize he had so ardently coveted, probably lost, in his eyes, the powerful attractions it had once possessed Furmer favourites, too, would zealously aim at occupying him with their allurements, lest a powerful rival should be elevated on their ruin, and his indolent spirit, content to know that she was within his reach, was probably beguiled without difficulty into declining an interview with her, until eventually she had almost passed away from his thoughts

But now every tongue found a theme of praise in the accomplishments of Nourmahal Chaja Aiass, disappoint ed as he had been in the destiny of his daughter, was still favoured by the emperor, and heard, on all sides, encomiums on the productions of her skill and industry. Not long could Jehangire be ignorant of that which incessantly occumed the imagination and furnished the conversation of those by whom he was constantly surrounded. His vanity was gratified by being the possessor of her in whose favour all seemed agreed, and that vanity stimulated his cu riosity Before the close of that day he had visited the apartments of Nourroadal Engaptured by the glow of her beauty, proud in the conviction that the whole world com mended her accomplishments, his passion was rekindled in more than its original vehemence, and from that hour the sunreme dominion of the favourite sultana was estab hehed Chaja Alass felt, at length that the brilliant destiny which the miraculous escape of the habe had predicted, had been realized in the elevation of the woman —rejoiced, and was satisfied. By the influence of his daughter he was eleva ted to the Vizarit, whilst his two sons were placed in the first rank of Omrahs

Their elevation, though originating in an unworthy source, might have reflected honour on the wisdom of the most sagacious monarch. The administration of Chaia Alass was distinguished for justice, talent, and success, the reins of the empire were in his hands, for Jehangire, intoxicated with his passion for his wife, resigned himself wholly to the influence of her charms Nevertheless, the voice of the people spoke content and gladness, for the minister was their judge and protector. Neither were men envious of the elevation of his sons, their moderation dis armed envy, and their prudeuce secured esteem

During the seven years that Chaia Aiass held the Vizarit, the influence of Nourmahal, unbounded as it was over the mind of Jehangire, was disarmed of any pernicious effects But at length the upright minister closed his extraordinary life, leaving behind him a name long holden in veneration by a people grateful for the blessings that had marked his ministry The grief of the sultana was unbounded The best affections of her heart were devoted to her father Admiration of his talents, gratitude for his assiduous cul tivation of her own, respect for his integrity, had effectu ally restrained the exercise of the unlimited power she possessed over the emperor Her character also was softened by its sympathy in the charities of human affinity, she was redeemed in some degree from the cold heartlessness resulting from the possession of supreme dominion; but with his death the restraint was removed. Although grat ified that her brother, Asiph Jah, was, by her desire, nominated as the successor to the office and dignities of his father,-aware, likewise, that his talents were worthy of the son of Chaja Alass, she had not that habitual reverence for him, that instinctive respect which makes us veil our very selves in the presence of superior intellect, united with unimpeachable integrity, in our desire of preserving the approbation we feel necessary to our happiness, which had encompassed her spirit in the lifetime of her father She gave the reins to her ambition, and allowed free indul gence to every caprice her passions or her haughtiness dictated The new minister saw, and trembled for, the mischief to the state that might result from the tyranny of so indomitable a temper He ventured a remonstrance, which was received with disgust, and with an imperious mandate to perform the duties of the Vizarit, and to with hold the least interference with the wishes of the sultana Asiph Juh submitted in silence to an evil for which the im becility of Jehangire promised no remedy, and set himself to perform zealously the duties of his exalted position, and counteract, as much as in him lay, the evils which could not effectually be prevented

Of the sons of Jehangure, Shah Jehan waa he who possessed those bold and energetic qualities necessary to the character of a prince Domestic dissensions had imbit tered the life of the emperor, who, beyond all things, coveted the enjoyment of indolence Chusero, his firstborn, had headed a rebellion against the royal authority, and was now confined in a fortress in Malwa Purvez, his second son, governed Candersh, residing at the capital with all the splendour of a sovereign Of an easy temper, inherited from Jehangire, he had little skill in the conduct of an army, or curbing the flery spirit of its officers. In a conflict with Ameer Sing, the Rajah of Odipore, he had, by his want of ability to remedy the difficulties that encompassed him, been compelled to retreat to Aimere with considerable loss The emperor himself hastened to that city, and sent Chirrum, his youngest and best beloved son. into the mountains, to prosecute the war. The event covered the southful prince with glory, and gave him an ascendency over Purvez, which subsequent events confirmed Purvez, with the bad success which was always attendant on his warlike efforts, was again engaged against the princes of the Deccan, and Chirrum, new named by his father Shah Jehan, "the King of the World," was sent, not-withstanding the representations of Asiah Jah of the danger of thus openly preferring his youngest born, to super sede Purvez in the command of the forces Purvez yielded what he was too indolent to contest, and Shah Jehan, with that prudence which, equally with his valout; characterized him, secured the glory of terminating the war, by betening to the terms of accommodation offered by the enmy, and removing every difficulty that threatened the amicable termination of the contest

An interval of thirteen years strengthened the mind, and confirmed the ambition of Shah Jehan After the lapse of that period, the princes of the Deccan, lulled into security by a long peace, violated the engagements on which that peace was founded To reduce them to submission, Shah Jehan was despatched with an immense force had already taken arms and had crossed the Norbudda, but, on his approach, ferrified by his numbers, and intimidated by the remembrance of his former victories, they made peace, and retreated This event confirmed the ambitious designs of Shah Jehan Chusero, his eldest brother, so long a prisoner, had been released at the request of Shah Jehan, and permitted to accompany him on his expedition This prince was secretly assassinated, and suspicion loudly accused Shah Jehan of instigating the deed Jehangire adopted the general opinion, and commanded his son to his presence Shah Jehan received this as the signal of re volt. Relying on the devotedness of his troops, he openly threw off his allegiance, assumed the royal titles, and ad vanced to attack the emperor His rebellion ended in complete defeat Deserted by his followers,-forsal en by his friends,-he who had been so elate of heart in prosperity, sank beneath the reverse, and a letter to Jehangure was the herald of his contrition and entire submission peror, with the clemency natural to his character, pardoned him, but commanded him to repair instantly with his family to Agra, - a mandate which he contrived to elude, and to travel, as if in quest of amusement, through various parts of the empire

Mothbet, the successful general, who had preserved the throne, and probably the life of his master, was regarded by the haught, Nourmahal with feelings of harded that were imbittered by every accession to his fame. He was one of the few who did not one his elevation to her influence, and not to be the creature, was to be enrolled amongst the enemies of the sultans. She sought by every artifice to awaken in the breast of Jehangure, that jealousy of superior merit, the common were of mean mind. She represented the danger to his assections which, wight, which from the high reputation of his victionius general. Such acted the part of the dark spirit with the Jewish monarch "Cannot he who preserved, also deprive?" she ask ed "Will not he who has the power of placing the crown where he pleases, find it best befitting himself? Shall the slave hold in his hands the destiny of the monarch? Jehangire listened, irembled, and believed Successive of ders to resign various commands, were followed by a mandate to present himself before the emperor Aware of the weakness of his master's mind,—of the supreme in fluence of Nourmahal, and her hatred of himself,—Mohbet represented the inconvenience to which obedience would subject him, and requested permission to remain

"Is the emperor now satisfied of the treason of the slave?"
—asked Nourmahal, and in imperious order for his immedate inpierarioe was issued

Mohabet wavered no longer Five thousand Rappoots, who had served under his banner, volunteered their attend ance, and with this escort he hastened to the imperial camp But ere he had actually approached, he was com manded to halt, until he had accounted for the expenditure of the Bengal revenue, and for the plunder acquired by his army in the late action Mohabet, humbled in the dust by this indignity, sent his son in law to the camp of the emperor to exonerate him from the imputations with which he was assailed Instead of listening to his defence, Jehan gire, whose anger became fierce in proportion to the iniu ries he was committing received the messenger with every mark of indignation He was treated with all the indigni ties that can be inflicted by oriental despotism Having been despoiled of his garments, covered with rags and suffered the nunishment of the bastinado, he was driven from the camp, placed backwards on a wretched tattoo. and exposed to the insults and scoffs of the populace, al ways ready to swell the current of royal vengeance The indignation of Mohabet was roused by the account of the contumely to which his son in law had been compelled to submit, and he prepared to avenge it, and wipe away the stain that had fallen on the honour of his family

Mon-bet withdrew his faithful band from the immediate neighbourhood of the camp of the emperor,—sheltered by an eminence near the river Jielum he remained a few days an quiet watchfulness of the motions of the royal army. At length he saw symptoms of immediate movement, and the foremost bandy passed the river, whilst all were on the march are the royal household. The rear of the tropes and crossed the river, and the tents of the emperor and his retinue remained still pitched. Monthlet, with part of his Rappools, salied forth, they rushed to the bridge, and destroyed it, thus cutting off the royal army from the power of returning Proceeding to the tent of Jehangire, he secured the person of the sovereign and whilst he effected his first object. Nourmahal escaped

Asiph Jab, the futhful servant of a weak master, on the following day put himself at the head of the army, and en deavoured to ford the river Mohabet received him on the opposite bank, and repulsed bim with great loss On this complete defeat the army dispersed, and Asiph Jah took refuge in a fortress on the Allock, which, however, he was speedily obliged to surrender Mohabet, too virtuous to heap indignities on the head of the unfortunate Jehangire, seemed to forget the injustice done to himself, and paid his master every honour consistent with his safe keening The emperor, no longer exposed to the influence of Nour mahal, confessed that he had too harshly treated his faith ful and victorious servant, and Mohabet contemplated a near period when, without endangering his own safety, he might restore his sovereign to perfect liberty Nourmahal, however, who had taken refuge at Lahore, set out to reioin the emperor Receiving tidings of her design, Mohabet sent forward a party of his followers, as if to constitute an escort, by which means he had a constant guard upon her actions Aware that her restoration to Jehangire would be followed by her absolute ascendency, and by measures which would probably lead to struggles that could term nate only either in the ruin of himself, or in the disposal of the monarch, he hastened to the presence of Jehangire, and accused Nourmahal of serious crimes The attachment of the emperor required to be sustained by the con stant presence of ite object, and n few month a separation had considerably weakened his affection for the sultana. In her absence he had learned that he could live very tranqually without her, and that she was by no means necessa ry to his existence, or even to his enjoyments He yielded to the remonstrances of Mobabet and signed the order for her execution Mohabet carried it to her She received it with stern composure. Her mind seemed always to gather strength in great emergencies. She said, "My enemies triumph, and the stars have decided that I must die Nevertheless, I have been faithful to the emperor, and for the years in which we have lived together, I desire to see him once more Then deal with me as you will "

Monabet, respecting the courage that characterized her, granted her request. He bad no fear of any evil result. Jehangure had become indufferent to his former idol, and, moreover, was naturally desirous of making a sacrifice which cost him little, to the wishes of the man who held hm prisoner Nourmahal prepared herself for a visit Attired with decorum, but divested of all her ornaments, with cheeks bedewed with tears, and with downcast eyes, she stood in the presence of the emperor. No word passes her tips, and as she slowly raised her eyes, she fixed them on Jehangire with a glance of tender reproach, which, it has ame time, expressed rather a melancholy resolution, than an appeal to his compassion. Her presence had swe kened in the heart of the vaciliating prince all those emotions which had rendered her former empire unbounded She seemed to him more desirable than ever, as she appeared on the verge of final departure. Her eyes penetrated his heart with a thousand semiments of love and compassion. Depirived of all mastery of himself, he burst into a passion of tears, and clasped her in his arms.

into a passion of tears, and clasped her in his arms
"Moh'bet," he said, "Mohabet, have you the heart to sle yits woman, and to break your master's 'See her tears
-behold mine.' Shall she—shall I—ween in vain?"—

There was a pause

"The emperor of the Moguls must not ask and be denied," said Mohabet, and from that moment Nourmabal resumed her royal state

Mohabet did not long detain the emperor in confinement In a few months he restored to him entire liberty, and generously confiding in the gratitude and the promises of his master, he dismissed the greater part of his own faithful adherents But he muscalculated the strength of Nour mahal's passions, and her strong tenacity of purpose To her former hatred of Mohabet was superadded a desire of vengeance for the peril in which, by his means, she had been placed, and for the insult that had been offered to her person in being brought to the camp of the general as a prisoner All her influence, all her arts, were employed to induce the emperor to order the execution of his former generous enemy, and now faithful subject, but in this solitary instance the virtue of Jehangire proved itself capable of resistance. Aware that his refusal bad only led the sultana to adopt the expedient of assassination, he had the justice to warn Mohabet of his danger. The unfortunate warrior, satisfied that immediate flight offered the only means of safety, hastened from the camp, unattended by either a friend or domestic Proclamations, at the instigation of Nourmahal, whose thirst for vengeance became the more intense when she found its object had escaped, were issued to governors of provinces, and to all persons holding official jurisdiction within the dominiors of the emperor, not to harbour or assist the fugitive, on peril of treason Thus proscribed, Mohibet resolved on a measure which indicated as much magnanimity in himself, as he ascribed to the persons to whom he meant to Intrust himself. He hastened to the tent of Asiph Jah, disguised, and under shelter of a moonless night,—planting himself in the pas sage that led from the tent of the minister to the apart ments of the females, I e remained until he was discovered by the officer of the guard This man, on ascertaining who addressed him, conducted him, as he requested to the Visier Asiph Jah long wearied and disquieted at the constant interruption his wisest and most beneficial de signs received from the haneful exercise of his sister's influence with the emperor, received Moh thet with assur ances of protection and concealed him in a place of secu rity A close alliance was formed between them, and the resolution that Johangire was incompetent to conduct the affairs of his kingdom, was acquiesced in by both. Purvez resembled his father too closely to promise to hecome a vigorous or a useful sovereign, and the confederates determining that Shah Jehan must succeed to the throne of Delhi, separated, and Mohabet proceeded to the court of the Rajth of Odeypore, there to await a favourable juncture for the execution of their plan

Natural events forestalled their designs Jeliangire died by a stroke of apoplexy and after a short contest with Shariar, the son of Jehangire, who had married the daugh placed on the imperial throne
the future fate of Nourmahal
She sank into the obscurity which the perpetual imprisonment of the widowed females of eastern princes naturally casts over their latter days, or she perished in that slaughter by which Shah Jehan cut off the whole male population of the house of Timur, save his own sons, thus establishing himself in unquestioned right and authority on the throne of the Moguls

She has served, however, If not "to point a moral," "to adorn a tale,' for poetry has cast a halo round her name, and made her so dear to the magnation, that we regret the severity of history which leaves such a portrait of ' THE

LIGHT OF THE HARAM

DOCTOR PAUL.

That small bungalow at the northern extremity of the lines of the - regiment, is an object of attention to all new comers Its situation is happily chosen. The com-pound slopes downwards to the river's bank, on one side, and a small grove of evergreens and flowering shrubs shades it from the road on the other Westward, there is a well cultivated and orderly garden. The milk hedges are cut scrupulously, and trained with great attention to appearance, and with considerable success. The drive up to the house, and the broad pathway round its verandahs, are smooth and cleanly, like a gravel walk in an English garden The fragrant mendy bounds one side of the avenue, and loads every gale with its hawthorn like perfume. Yes, hawlhorn like, at least, it pleases one to faney the resemblance, which may passivery well here. If it crawned a violet ban', at home, indeed-but why depreciate the shruh by the comparison? We may be grateful for its actual sweetn ss, and for the thoughts it brings of spring tide evenings, and pleasant, paradisc-like fields and shrubberie-far, far away There is no vegetation immediately surrounding the house there is a plain, at least ten yards square, entirely bare But this is healthy, it taints the atmosphere with no malaria, it threatens no fever, and it harbours no moschetoes The house itself is oval, thatched, low roofed, and with gray walls A verandali entirely surrounds it, supported by chunammed pillars of the most cleanly white It is raised at least five feet above the level of the country, in that and in everything built to the greatest possible advantage, and to afford the greatest possible share of accommodation and comfort

It belongs to Doctor Paul, who knows everybody, and whom everybody knows and everybody likes

Doctor Paul cannot be under forty, or, at most, a year or two. His is just that complexion on which one is quite sure that the climate has produced no effect, he is not one of those whom these suns have purched and shrivelled in a look of premature age. His face is suffused with one tint of—what siral it call it? It is neither puth nor red, it approaches more nearly to the former, but is quite free from all those associations of too prest consistintly which one its so apit to attack to complexions resembling it. His features are shirp and hooked his forchead retreating so exceedingly as to take to the orm of his head the appearance of a caracture. His figure and limbs are long, lanky, and lones, somebody called him the original of Dominite Sampson. His eyes are gray and keen, with just sufficient obliquity to give a east of the comic to his physiognomy in discussion, his manner becomes schement and loud by yound all rule and his gestienthon proportionably violent.

He lins none of that 'patience of attention" which cha racterized Napoleon He is restless as soon as his opponent begins to advance his proofs, and, unable to bear the irritation of contradiction, he interrupts with an abruptness and violence unpardonable in any person who has not the apology of originality, and the privilege of being privileged. But then Doctor Paul is really the most excellent person's ready to do a good office. His errors are attributed to the contracted sphere in which his early life was passed, to the deficient education that was bestowed on him accent is always Scotch when he is warm it becomes broadly so, and then he has an assortment of French and Latin phrases, which, though always properly applied, are so disguised in the pronunciation, as surely to be beyond the recognition of those to whom they are, or were the mother tongue Occasionally, too, he indulges in Johnsonian phrase, still guildess of Mrs Malaprop's sin but masking the words in such sounds as might have added to the confusion of Babel, and which certainly have the effect of giving one trait of the sublime to his sentences-they are obscure All his knowledge has been thought out by himself, and he probably values his acquirements the more, that they are so thoroughly his own property Nature has bestowed on him her higher gifts with a niggard hand, but she has in some sort compensated for her neglect, by en dowing him with a perseverance that knows no fatigue, and dreads and is deterred by no obstacle His acquaint ance with Indian society has not tended to enlarge his views, and perhaps, take him for all in all, there never was a mind of equal strength, so over stocked with prejudices of all kinds, shades and descriptions

From his age, his length of service, and the unusual cucumstance of his always having been attached to one corps, the young men look up to him as the father of the regiment, and fly to him for advice and assistance in all their diffculties. He is liberal of both, and the distressed invariably leave his door with a lightened step and a more cheerful feart. He invents excuses for them to their evel tors, and If these will not pass current, as too frequent utterance of faces the impression of the purest cour, he drives away the dun by too much "palsh, palsh!" as they term it, and keeps trumphant possession of the field until the next month. He is also the general scribe—the dictator of official applications for leave, and apologies for neglects, and explanations of errors, in short, personal staff to every in-dividual officer, who consequently deems l'ather Paul, as they call him, the best frend he has on earth, and pretty nearly the eleverest fellow in the worth.

Although the very oppearonce of Doctor Paul is an antidote to sentiment, yet there is a bittle romance in his his tory, Indeed, what human being laves, who cannot cull from the common places of his existence some short periot, that seems to him in ofter-days as a passage through fairy land? There were hints and surmises, gathered from his own occasional allusions, and from the recollections of his enrice frends, of an attachment, imbibed in his very boyhood when a peasant boy amongsi persints ha sunmed himself with his fitter's sheep on the hill side, or by the banks of a burn, shaded by o mass of lenfy trees it seems that Doctor Paul had been a sickly child, and so weak as to be unfitted for inhorious employments, which! awakened the charity of the village Galen who bestowed? on him all his own skill, and then his mother was a far off causin of the laird's-so that by degrees Doctor Paul was put In the way of higher attainments, and in process of time came to India assistant surgeon to pluck the gold mohurs, and return to Scotland a pabob. But this is antichartion. The attrehment of his boyhood began and ! flourished under circumstances quite à la mode de Jeanie Deans and Reuben Butler, and the fur indulged dreams that lasted some years. But the persuosions of some rural Dumbiedikes were more effectual with Doctor Paul's fair one than with her prototy pe It was the old history of woman's ficklene-s-and the wise pronounced it the origin of oll the harmless peculiarities which distingul h the forsaken. Whenever he speaks of woman, it is to depreciate her, he affects to look down on her tnt-liect, and to consider her, en morale, by no means too perfect. But then he so contradicts all his b tterness of speech by his net ons? In the whole cuntonment there is not a man more attentive ' to the other sex-more careful of their comfort-and in the r indispositions the I indest of medical attendants that, despite his misanthropic tinge, he is always considered a lady's man and employed in the thousand little

offices appropriated to the character

He is a great admirer of Blackwood, and an enthusiast in his culogies of the " Noctes" It is suspected that he makes a study of the shepherd's part in those colloquies, for he quotes sentence upon sentence ad infinitum secret heart he has pronounced a ban on the Edinburgh, into the pages of which he never glances, but he has so much nationality, that if an unfortunate Englishman dis parages The Review ever so slightly, Doctor Paul's Scottish feelings are immediately up in arms against the offender, at whom he vociferates with a vehemence and persever ance that would be almost in excess, if employed in the defence of his dearest friend. His eyes kindle, and his complexion deepens to crimson, whilst his accent becomes almost too broad to be comprehended by the ears of the southron, if he were not assisted by the recollection, that no Scotchman can allow an Englishman to speak slightingly of the country, and, notwithstanding a difference of political faith, the aforesaid Edinburgh is considered by all parties as a national property, with which profane hands are not to intermeddle

Dr. Paul is a great diner-out. He has always more in vitations than any other person, and never declines except on the ground of a bond fide pre-engagement. He is a favourite guest at the mess, where he talks at pleasure, gen erally having the field to himself, and conscious that the warm applause of his audience follows him He sings too -every thing that Burns ever wrote, capable of being har monized, and much that he never did write All his songs have a touch of the sentimental in them, -sea songs, of the school of Dibdin and Incledon, being his abomination His ear is correct, but his taste-however, being of no school, it is original, and his harmonious ornaments pleare not the less because they are more amusing than elegant. Altogether the play of his features-his gestures-give such universal delight, which it boots not to analyze too closely, and Doctor Paul is so frequently solicited to do honour to the wine, that he retires in a condition of great comfort and exaliation, always terminating his visit with a speech of desultories, connected by a link of eulogy on himself, which is the exuberance of his own harmless vanity, and draws forth thunders of applause from his gifled audience

On the whole, Doctor Paul is quite a character—to be placed to the composite roder, the composite parts the composite parts the composite parts being strong mind, and Indian society. He belongs to a species never found in Europe, because he is the produce of circumstances that have no existence there. This imperfect sketch falls far short of his claims to attention,—to be justly appreciated, he must be intimately known. However, though unhalshed, the likeness is accurate, and will be recognised by all who belong to that numerous and respectable body, the friends and admirers of Docron Pact.

THE BALL.

What an excitement agitates the whole population of an up country station at the announcement of a Ball -what a succession of hopes and fears amongst the subalterns expectant of invitations! In India the position of the sexes, as far as regards public entertainments, is exactly reversed, ladies are as much recherchees here as beaux in England. Quadrilles must be danced, and there must be an adequate proportion of females to dance them, therefore, she who is issume her cards whatever may be her own pretensions, or her fastidiousness on ordinary occasions, is under the necessity of waiving all of her objections to le plus maucais ton; hidenusness, fourteen stones, execrable Figlish or French precisely as good, and a host of atrocities, which render the possessors madmissible at morning calls, meligible at dinners, but-faute de choix-essential at balls. The list of names masculine is conned, however, with very considerable scrutiny, when abundance offers itself to the selection, propie can afford to be critical The unfortunates are quite aware of the existing state of things, and know themselves between the horns of dilemma-either to endure whims and caprices of no common extent, or to take refuge in the pride of disdaining the society of womankind of all descriptions, at dinner, ball, or supper, morning call, or evening drive This class, however, is not numerous, and the great majority of the cantonment were relieved on the present occasion from considerable anxiety, by learning, after the issuing of a few cards, that Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke meant to make quite a general thing of it Every heart, therefore, was at liberty to dwell on the anticipated delights of the evening, accord ing to its own peculiar mode of enjoyment <sup>16</sup> Yes, on due reflection, and Latutemant Colonel Parke, looking wise simest in proportion to his weight, "it will be advisable to tak everybody. I may be removed, you know, Anne, cobbedy can say how soon, are who can tell what copps I shall get next? and at my time of life, Mrs. Parke, it is better to be on amiscable terms with my officers?

you understand, Mrs Parke? A word to the wise-

"It is a pity you did not come to that conclusion sooner," said Mrs Parke, amiably, "for every officer of ours has sent n refusal, except Grampos, who goes anywhere for a feed gratis "

"I don't care, so much the better," returned Leculerant-Colonel Parke, sukily, "my young men want a few countmartials amongst them and I'll see if I can't have two or three of them in arrest before long I'll have them out to sauad drill, and see how they'll like it, humph!'

Mrs Parke turned away, half in a pet with her "model for all colonels, past, present, and to come," as his mutneers called him, and half sngry at the defiance implied by the declining of all the officers of their own regiment except Mr Grampus, who indeed, as Mrs Purke had elegantly expressed it, went anywhere for a feed gratis

She looked over her notes with all the haste the difficul-

She looked over her notes with all the haste the difficulty she found in decyphering any person's autograph that was less than the magnitude of round hand, permitted Mire Parke had great disadvantages to contend with some said "old Parke had picked her up at n charity school at Calcutta, some hinted that her childhood had been spant under auspices much less unexceptionable, there were many and divers reports aftoat, but one point of accordance existed amongst all—Mire Parke was originally nody—had bad manners—most unforgivable awkwardness of address—unusually plain person, and if this had not been a period of particular dulness in the canioment of the period of particular dulness in the canioment of have been confined to the canaille

As it was, however, Mrs Parke rad no cause to be dissatisfied with the reception of her ir vitations. Acceptance followed on acceptance, and not withstanding a few lindignant risings of temper at the insolent refusals of "our own" officers, she addressed herself, in very pleasant mood, to effect the necessary preparations

Two large field officers' tents were putched in the compound, as supper rooms. The hall was "to be dedicated to the votaries of Terpsichore," as the newspapers express it. The cook had special instructions, the builder was lectured into the most unconditional supplity, and Mrs Parke prepared, and her tailor executed, all the furbelows and fripperies she had gathered to be fashionable from the "Magazins des Modes" which lay on her table, the latest number of which was only twelve months old

The evening came, the moon was as bright as Indian moons at the full generally are The hall was nearly cleared, the tents were nearly furnished. Mrs. Parke was dressed, very much to her own satisfaction, in a wast to be bigs, and a petitional falled and stiffened into the dignified roundity of a hoop, and floomed over two thirds of is longitude. A vast pyramid of roses aided considerably the imposing effect of her appearance, and she looked "to the full as well," Cornet Witherby said, "at could be expected"

10*

The guests were all collected, and the band having preluded a few flourishes, remarkable chiefly for their origin ality—no slight ment in these degenerate days—a double set of quadrilles were formed, and active operations forthwith commenced

The ears of Midas seemed quite the fashion, there was such scrambling, and pushing, and showing, and directing —now in French, now in English patois—"Classez d to droite—" Ballotez"—"Ball

Push—scramble—shout—shove—Ac &c &c

However, there was plenty of mirth—jokes—laughing not quite within the innus preservised by Chesterfield, and not quite within the innus preservised by Chesterfield, and perhaps, except in a few instances, the blindering of the dancers aromoted an early this trace of decouple the production of the innus production of the production of the tent.

The tables were covered—were groaning beneath the slaughtered heratombs. It was a feast fit for Homer's lie tores, centures have been gathered to the "years before the thood" since any thing resembling it has been afforded by the hospitality of "merry Englynd". Soup of all kinds—mulligatawney, and vermicelt, and turtle,—hige turkeys and huger hams,—barons of beef,—saddles of multon;—greese and all manner of fame flow,—legs of pickled poils, and perse pudding,—these were the delicacies that temple of the appetites of Indian encours. Two or three ultra-fishionasts, just imported from cold and ucy Europe, stared, and turned a hitle pale us they inhaled the steam arising from he vanous "assources"—swallowed a [elly and a biscuit, and he vanous "assources"—swallowed a [elly and a biscuit, and a glass of wine, but the rest of the party addressed themselves valuantly to the work of devastation They drank beer in huge tumblers-men and women, they ate of the beef, and the mutton, and the pork, and the turkeys, and the foxls, and they closed with real Mussulmaum curries The punkahs were fanned manfully in all directions, nevertheless they waxed warm - each guest had one or two of his own servants in attendance, so that the tents were crowded to suffocation, and, as somebody said afterwards, there was fixed air enough within the walls to prove that animals may exist therein Indeed, the atmosphere was so purely artificial, that the removal of the ylands exposed the organs of the sensitive to attacks somewhat more offensive

There was a call for "a song from Colonel Parke," and the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Parke, in obedience thereto, put on a countenance that rendered him fit to exhibit as the frontispiece to Colman's "Broad Grins," and addressed himself to the task incontinently. He sang, no matter for the name, such a song! And applause was vociferated, and the ladies laughed, and looked well pleased, except the two or three lately imported; who, Mrs Parke declared, gave themselves a great many airs. And then the females returned to the ball room, just as the colonel politely gave, ' the ladies," and the gentlemen remained to make themselves better qualified for the campaigning that was to succeed

In process of time, dancing recommenced, and the scrambling and laughing and vociferating were more emphatic than before And they whirled in the Snanish dance until some became giddy, and others stumbled, and others fell Then there nas a second supper, of grills, and stews, and lukewarms, and cold, of which the majority of the ladies partook, and dancing was resumed -reels and country dances, until, by the ald of frequent refreshings of negus, the greater part of the lother sex were in a condition which admonished their gentler partners, not only of the propriety, but of the absolute necessity of a retreat.

When they were fairly deposited in their various vehicles, tonjons, or palanquins, a scene of uproarrous revelry commenced, of which it is needless to denict the details. Bursts of the coarsest laughter repaid jests as coarse; toasts au't tempests of applaose, songs, and thundering knocks upon the table, led the way to a third support before the termination of which, glasses, bottles, dishes, and viands, were flying about in all directions. One by one the guests walked off, or were carried away, accordingly as they lost or retained power over their muscles; and so the glory of Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke's ball.

116 THE BALL

like all other mundane glories, passed away

Not so the memory of it The most mirthful of the guests were by no means the least backward in expressing their censure of the vulgarity and bad taste that had marked the whole proceeding. They ridiculed the supper, the dancing, the dresses of the ladies, and Mrs Parke herself above all others Her person, her manner, her extravagance, her temper, afforded in succession matter of con-Some of Mrs Parke's very good natured friends, wounded that she should receive such a recompense for her hospitality, were careful to repeat as many of the censuring and censurable remarks that were flying in all directions, as they could nossibly gather Poor Mrs Parke sighed over her folly, and was foud and incessant in her lamentations to the colonel, that so many rupees had been wasted on such dreadful ingrates The colonel made a gesticulation explanatory of his anger whether at Mrs Parke, or the guests, or both, is a mystery that has never yet been solved; and it was observed that the introduction of this subject, for many days afterwards, never clicited from him any other remark than that which his intimates understood to be conveyed by his pithy and emphatic "humph by

But all mortification and bitterness disappeared from the amisble bosoms of Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke, and they basked in a halo of glory emanating from that fountain of intelligence, that most luminous of all journals,

the - Gazette

"Most sincerely do we congratulate our brethren in the east"-the editor speaks in proprid persond-" on the spirit of hospitality diffused through every station, however remote, in which Europeans are congregated Nothing can have a more beneficial tendency in ameliorating the condition of the exile, and in dissipating the tedium of a protracted residence in this angenial clime, than a disposition to promote innocent mirth and elegant conviviality our own parts, we must confess, that though our dancing days are over, we are not so 'fallen into the sere and yellow leaf as to be incapable of enjoying the spectacle afforded by the hilarity which pervades a ball room, the gennine design of which is seldom obtained so entirely in any part of the world as in lodia We are the first to hail the gayeties that are announced, and to afford the warmest meed of our praise to those which have delighted and passed away, only, it is hoped, to be socceeded by others as effectual in binding the hearts of the European community in one link of amity. In accordance with our plan of paying tribute where tribute is due, we conceive we should fall greatly in our duty to our readers and ourselves, if we neglected to notice a splendid ball and supper given at pore, by Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke, to whom the whole cantonment are indebted for various preceding acts of bosoitality Wederive our information from a private letter

"The guests were nearly all assembled at nine r M., and shortly afterwards, the band of the regiment which the gallant host commands, played a lively air, that served as a signal to the votaries of Ternsichore to select their partners The elegant quadrille and the graceful waltz by turns afforded the dancers opportunity of displaying their proficiency in this highly attractive accomplishment, until midnight, when supper was announced, and the numerous assemblage adjourned from the ball room to two field officers' tents of the largest size and most commodious form, tastefully decorated, round the sides of which the supper tables were laid out, covered with every choice delicacy that can be culled from the east and the west, and furnishing, in their abundance, farther pronfs, if necessary, of the munificent hospitality so characteristic of Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke The richest wines flowed profusely round, wit sparkled as the nectareous beverage was imbihed, songs from many gentlemen of highly cultivated tasta added to the spirit of the scene, and Lieutenant-Colonel Parke himself afforded his guests the high gratification of witnessing a display of those comic powers for which he la so eminent +

"The ladies retired at length from the supper rooms, and were speedily followed by their gallant partners, who were too well aware of the exquisite delight conferred by female society, lightly to forego its charms when within their reach Dancing recommenced, and the morning gun had fired as the last remaining guest departed-closing reluctantly a night of the most animated excitement; where mirth had been controlled only by elegance, and where the vivacity of youth had been indulged with that moderation which the known good taste and exquisite fashion of Mrs Parke prescribed

"Above twenty ladies graced the entertainment by their presence, and the beauty of their persons-the air of high ton conspicuous in their address—the perfect taste displayed in their costume, of the finest texture, most costly description, and most fashionable form, threw over the scene an enchantment which only their presence could diffuse There was no gaucherie manifest to dissipate the illusion, and the rapt gazer might, without any great exag geration of fancy, imagine himself at Almack's

118 THE BALL

"To Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs Parke the whole station are in the highest degree indebted, not only for the pleasure of the evening, great as it was in itself, but for such an opportunity of exhibiting the temper and tone of refinement which pervades the society They have afforded an irrefragible contradiction to the absurd opinion prevalent in Europe, that the good breeding and elegance which control the best circles at home are unknown here, and that instead of them, our entertainments are conspicuous only for the extreme of dulness, or of bousterous murth, equally hostile to the polished relaxation which a refined mind re quires as its necessary aliment. This erroneous opinion is now very little entertained amongst the best informed at home, so far as regards the presidencies, -but we lament to say there is an existing prejudice relative to up country, or Mofussil stations A few more entertainments so well conducted, will suffice to remove this most unfounded and indeed illiberal prepossession, and most happy shall we be to afford the aid of our widely-circulated columns in effacing so unjust an impression. We therefore solicit frequent communications from our Mofussil readers, to enable us, by a plain and unvarnished statement of facts, to remove prejudices so injurious to the social character of our respected countrymen, whose duty fixes them for long periods in remote districts"

"Humph"—said Lieutenant Colonel Parke, and it was the first pleasurable "humph"—he had uttered on the subject If Goldsmiths Mr Burchell had utmessed the producing cause, and read the encomium, he would bare contributed possibly his countly emphatic—"fueled."

THEZAH AND ADJEIT.

Own of the most beautiful vales in Central India is situated on a branch of the Nerbuddah, whose bright and blue stream intersects it from north to south. The village that lies on the right bank of the river, with its white huis glittering through the tope which shadows it, is as picture sague as any that adorns the Indian landscape. A building of imposing dimensions, on a commanding eminence just beyond the village, and a pagoda at the other extremity, contests the palm of superiority. The former is the country house of the Zemındar of the district.

The whole region teems with fertility Immediately under the eye of the master whose prosperty depends on its cultivation, it is little likely that a negligent or ignorant typot should be permitted to continue a tenant of the soil couldn't had been an indugent, and convequently a wise landlord, he knew well that the cultivator, ground down by rigorous exactions, has enther the industry requisite to produce the full proportion of grain, nor the hope noces asry to animate his exertions. He knew that the improving condition of his ryots was one grand assurance that his own coffers would be filled—the calculated accurately, that he who taxes man's labour beyond his power, will in the end lose all by his van attempt to grasp too much He knew, in short, that no Zemindar could prosper in the midst of a starring tenantic.

But Coudinh's life waned apace, and the sun of his days was shortly extinguished. His son aucceeded him, as holder of the district,—but Goupaldoo inherited only the weath of his father, no law of inheritance, unfortunately, can secure the legitimate descent of wisdom, and often the folhes of the child scatter dust on the grave of the parent Goupaldoo loved ease better than any thrag in the world He had been known to sacrifice to it in the indulgence of his darling propensities. To sit on the cushions that covered his verandah, gazing out upon his own broad lands, and enjoying the odour of his kaleean, whilst its bubbing julled him into dreamy stupor,—was to him the acmé of felicity To such a man, consequently, a minister—a factorum—a steward—was absolutely necessary, and Kishimith, having passed through various gradations of servitude, finally attained the post of distinction

Kishamah was as indefatigable as his master was indo Keen, astute, ready witted, he contrived to render every event subservient to his own interest -an object of which he never for an instant lost sight. The advantages which his position afforded, were by no means thrown away on his perception He knew well the means of op pression -of ruin,-within his power, and the ryots were not long in having this discovery forced on them Very soon also it was well understood that Kishamah was accessible to a bribe, and that he who could give most largely, might ensure a favourable consideration of his case, even if justice lay altogether with his opponent. This accessi bility led the unfortunate ryots to the commission of fiauda and outrages on each other,-to the indulgence of the spirit of littration so unhappily general amongst the Hindoos,-for every man overlooking the fact, that his adversary might offer a higher bribe than he, believed that he might purchase on all occasions a decision in his own fa your Of course the result was always disappointment to one of the contending parties, -in many instances despair And it soon became a truth painfully apparent to themselves, that from having been the most prosperous the happiest, and the most contented cultivators of the whole large district, those in the nearer neighbourhood of the Zemindai were decidedly the most wretched and unfor tunate

There was one dwelling, bowever, where peace and plenteousness still inhabited It was the abode of so much pure and deep affection, that it seemed as if every ungentler guest vere excluded thence forever It stood somewhat apart from the group of cottages belonging to the other villagers,-it had also rather a broader from and its walls were freshly chunammed, and its roof was neatly and securely thatched Its interior arrangements were simple in the extreme,-it was divided by a mat of the palmira bark, which screened part of it from the eye of the intruder Its furniture was scanty as the wants of the Hindoo, -two sleeping cots, with setringes and prlumpores, in the inner apartment,-a few cushions as articles of luxury,the usual proportion of brass cooking vessels and chatt es in the outer, completed the whole of its, gazniture. Still, comfort-happiness-existed here for here was an abundant provision for many luxuries compatible with their inartificial habits

It was the abode of an individual of the Raincot caste. who had lately married a girl of his own tribe Adject Sing possessed a person distinguished for its peculiar strength and beauty, and the loveliness of Tulzah, his bride, made her more than an equal mate for him They were both orphans, and every separate affection of their hearts seem ed gathered into one strong feeling of absolute devotion to each other Adject was a discharged sipahi, and his merits had recommended him to the notice of the late Zemindar. who made him putail of the village Whether from his own superior skill, or, as the envious said, from his better luck, every thing to which he set his hand prospered change of Zemindars had not affected his prospenty Free from the liugious spirit of his neighbours, -inoffensive, and known to be the possessor of strength and cour age to assert his own rights by his own personal prowess. -respected also from the position he held, -he pursued his usual course of harmless existence, unmolested by the most mischievous Tenderly careful of the comfort of Tulzah, he redoubled his efforts for their common support, and permitted her not to perform any of those laborious offices which were usual to the females of their rank was his pride to think, when toiling beneath the mid day sun, that she was securely sheltered in her shady nest, not injoring her slight frame by drudgery, nor encountering the rude gaze of coarse and vulgar men Adject was as I have said, a Raipoot, and to him, therefore, the exposure of his wife was an event to be deprecated and averted by every possible means

Their habitation stood apart from the village, indeed it was so shaded by a large tamarind tree on one side, and by its garden of plantains on the other, that Tulzah was accustomed to seat herself under the shelter of the former, to enjoy the freer breath of the evening air, and to watch, with her husband, the returng light of the vet glorious sun regions the twilight is so short, that there seems no resting place between day and night, but then, to compensate the poet or the man of melancholy for his disappointment, the moon rises so brightly, so beautifully, that he, of this character, who stands in that softly brilliant light, might well wish it were never to be displaced by the more garish sun wish was sometimes even pronounced by Tulzah, who had no more poetry than nature usually bestows on the young, and no melancholy save when Adjest remained absent longer than his wont, and such a wish she uttered one evening when with him she sat be eath the shade of the broad tamarind tree, watching the last red streaks of the day on one side, and the splendid rising of the moon, perceptible through the opening branches of a tope that lay between Tulzah and the east, on the other

She had scarcely heard her husband's laughing cen sure of the absurdity of such a wish, when a piercing shriek burst from her lips, end before Adjeit could ascer tain the cause, she had covered her face with her drapery and fled

That cause was not, however, long unexplained to the startled husband Standing in the shadow, right opposite to the spot where Tulzah had reclined, Adjest recognised the forms of Goupaldoo, the zemindar, and his prime min ıster, Kıshamah

He wondered why they were there, but it was not for him to ask, and they received and returned the usnal salam, without expecting an inquiry, or dreaming of an ex planation But for many hours after they had disappeared he was busied in vain attempts at assigning some probable

motive for their presence

He knew not that the one only stimulus capable of rousing Goupaldoo from his indolence, was his passion for beauty He knew not that the grace of Tulzah, carefully as she concealed herself from common eyes, was the theme of many He knew not that he was an object of hatred and jealousy to Kishamah, in whose path of prosperity he appeared as Mordecai appeared to Haman He knew not, therefore, that his rum was resolved by one who always tracked his victims to destruction.

A few moons waned, and where was Tulzah?-where was Adjett? Alas, those moons had shone on scenes of much suffering and degradation! Adjeit had lost his little chieftainship, his cattle had died, his property had been destroyed by invisible means, his house had been burnt down, he had been bribed by Goupaldoo to give him his wife, he, a Rairoot, had been bribed—he, of the tribe of the lion-to dishonour his name, to violate his caste to volunteer for infamy! Bribes, promises, all had been dis dainfully rejected, and he pressed his beloved and tear ful wife to his heart as he vowed rather to devote her to

Tulzah disappeared, and the unhappy husband, desperate and distrustful of all creation sometimes harboured the suspicion that she had voluntarily deserted him It was in the silence of the night that he had been bereft, and if violence had attempted such an outrage, would not a shriek -a cry for rescue from her hps-have roused him from the deepest slomber that ever steeped his senses? And above all, when the rumour of his loss was carried to the zemindar, he had immediately sent out a body of men in all directions to aid in discovering whither Tulzah had been conveyed. He, therefore, was guiltless. He had. moreover, endeavoured to console him with the assurance that he should be restored to his former office, that things might yet wear a better aspect and offered aid to rebuild his little dwelling. But Adjelt accepted it not; what was his dwelling to him when the light of it was gone? What could prosperity give, when she, for whose sake it was precious, was removed utterly from his sight? Oh, nol All things were hateful to him. He turned with loathing from the cheerfulness of the sun; he shrank with disgust from the gay flowers he had used to gather for her. His food was swallowed hastily and scantily, to satisfy the mere cravings of human nature. His person was neglected; his beard had grown ever since her disappearance. His featores were sharpened-his eyes sunk-his cheeks hollow-his person stooping and lean, and his footsteps feeble. His usual occupations were neglected; his days were spent in a search which became more hopeless every hour; his nights passed in restless and uneasy sleep, or in unquiet wandering round the neighbourhood. In short the villagers, who scarcely understood that the mere loss of a wife was one of such great magnitude, and who were themselves accustomed to endure all the evils of destitution, began to look on him as one under the duminion of an evil spirit ---

It was the deep and dark midnight. The moon in her wane had not yet risen, and though the stars and the planets studded the heavens, the objects of earth were scarcely distinguishable. Adjett lay under his tamarind-tree, as of old, and he gazed up at the sky ax if he reproached it with his woes. Sleepless and disturbed he lay, and his thoughts were with Tukzah, and he deemed himself alone.

But he was not alone. There stood near him another human being of small stature and sight form. But he knew it not until he heard in murmurs, hike a whisper—"Adjet!" and he felt that there was but one who would thus have called on him

He rose instantly, breathlessly. He saw not his companion, but his ootstretched hand grasped her, and forgetting all his suspicions in the joy of restoration, he clasped her in his arms, and in a scream of wild exultation, he cried—"My Tulzah!—Tulzah!—Leave me no more, oh Tulzah!"

But, disengaging herrelf, she sank from his arms to his feet, and as she lay prostrate befare him, her breast head with convuleive cobs, and in accents almost sufficiently she suid—"Embrace me not! awn me not! reject me spurn me, Adject! I am polluted, I am defiled, I am be come thy shame and thy reproach! Wife meet for the no more, I have sought thee but to die at thy feet, Adject, to tell thee of my disbonour, it animate thee to vengeance, to assure thee, that thy poor Tulzah was forn from thy side, by ruffinally hands, when peaceful slumber was in our dwelling, but oh, what boots n? They have defiled me, Adject —I am wile, warthess, not to be named as thine Thy wife, thou Rajpoot, hath been dishonoured !!

He raised her formbly from the earth, and he wildly covered her with kisses. The faint moon rising shone on her aftered face, and told him in bitter signs what the destroyer had influeted on her. Again and again he en braced her—"Thou wert true" he cried, "thou wert true, Tulzah —But thou art dishonoured, and, Tulzah, thou must die 178

"And for that I sought thee, Adject" ahe crued, "to tell thee I must die 'Ta tell thee, too, thy Tulzah hath drunk her I hat drop of life, and tasted the sweetness of revengel The dog slept securely at my sade, and with his own cruss I stabbed him as he lay, within the walls of his own ten, as he despoiled thy roof, was he despoiled I stabbed him twice, yea, three, Adject —thus—thus—thus —thus with the wall of the control of the control

The weapon had been cancealed beneath her drapery, and now he opposed nat the dreadful work af death and now he opposed hat the dreadin work at death ""Thou hast spared me a sore task, Tulzah," said he calmly, as he lay beside her dying form "In truth, thou hast died bravely, it was well—that thou hast done, is well in

Beneath the tree he burned the body af Tulzah where it lay And he arose as the day dawned on the completion of his work, and he prepared an ample meal, and be ate it

greedily And he departed and was seen no more

A few weeks wore away, and the vile servant of a vile master, Kishamah, persished—as that master had done-by violence. His body was faund beneath the tamarind tree, covered with deep gardes inflicted by a creiss. The murderer was never discavered, and Adject was heard at no more. One of the tryots indeed declared, that on the night of the murder, he saw a man precipited hard her light of the murder, he saw a man precipited hard her looked with the look if Adject. But the man's own secount was so incoherent, that hitle credit was attached to it, especially as the mash was an the wane on the night in question In a short time, the story was remembered only as a village legend, and children wandered to the tamerind tree, and watched a paur of doves on its branches, into which they said the spirits of Adjeit and Tulzah had transmigrated

11*

A LETTER HOME.

" DE REBUS OMNIGUS."

"MY DEAR Z-

"I sar down with all possible haste to answer the queres contained in your letter of the 19th October, which, as you will see by the date of this, has scarcely been three months from England A capital voyage that! Nevertheless, I do not think our community will be satisfied, until that time be reduced to one half, by means of steam—'a consumma tion devoutly to be wished?

"Firstly, with regard to the boys-a writership for James, by all means, but as to the cadetship for Benjamin, I am more dubious, indeed, if you can secure him any decent provision in another line, by all means decline your friend's It is worth nothing-absolutely nothing, in this our day it holds out perhaps a flattering prospect to you, happy in your ignorance,' but assure yourself it is as fallacious as the mirage to the desert traveller, if it be even as alluring Reduction is the order of the times, and the most luminous exhibition of the march of intellect yet manlfested to our vision in the East The army is overstocked, fearfully, so far as regards the hopes of young aspirants Ensigns thrown back to cadets-starting on a hundred rupees a month-hungry heutenants in a state of absorption, and gray headed captains not within ten years of the step-are facts from which you may proceed to draw inferences by induction on the most approved Baconian principles You say Benjamin acquires languages with extraordinary facility, and you believe certain appointments are the reward of proficiency in the native tongue, and that these render an officer's career both much easier and much more lucrative Let me set you right on this noint

In one word—which perhaps would be better placed at the conclusion than at the commencement of the detail; for the peroration should coatain an abstract of all the argument-a little interest is worth incalculably more than any definable quantity of knowledge A few years since a considerable premium rewarded the diligence of every officer whom a committee, assembled for the purpose, pronounced to be competently skilled in Hindostanee A further donation of similar amount recompensed the acquirement of Persian This stimulus, however, was, in the course of time, found to rouse the energies of too great a number of candidates, and consequently to draw too largely on the funds of the Honourable Company It was therefore reduced to a fraction of the original amount, and called an honorary reward, but at the same time it was notified that regimental staff appointments were to be the substantial accompaniment. This might have been as effectual as the original plan, in obtaining an object so every way desirable as the proficiency of an officer in the language of the great body of the army to which he is attached-of the soldiers under his command But how has the design been carried into execution ?-how has the promise been performed ?- how has the golden hope of the aspirant been realized? To quote one or two instances by way of exemple -I know a young subaltern of some eight years' standing, who, having a family et home in no affluent circumstances, has essiduously devoted himself to the study of Hindostance, in the hope of acquiring an enpointment on the regimental staff, and the means of assisting them The expected vacancy occurs after a long interval, his application is made, and in the next G O he has the satisfaction of finding himself passed over in favour of a wouth of condition, who is most admirably calculated to be an interpreter of a language of which he does not know the alphabet, whilst his colloquial acquaintance with it amounts to 'Jao,' and 'Ao,' and 'Lao,' and such recondite phrases. Another youth, of similar accomplishments, has won the prize from many competitors, by having been the lucky bearer from home of a parcel of female trumpery for a lady in office, who willed that he was to be so recompensed for the trouble of carriage and the safe delivery Therefore, my dear Z-, unless you can find means to pack up sundry letters of strong recommendation with the rest of Ben jamin's outfit, never for a moment dream, that 'if it should rain staff uniforms, one of them would fit him '

"There are, as you well know to be usual in the character of all corporations, ranous evils radically connected with the Indian army, interwoven, indeed, with its very constitution, and to be remedied only at the expense of such innovations as we unspeculative soldiers greatly dread But all our evils are not of this character. There are many susceptible of removal, and others again of alleviation There are some, the absence of which even we 'with silvery heads' hope to experience Our public journals will give you quite as much information on this head as you can possibly require The slowness of promotion is the leading grievance; the palnable and coveted remedy, that it should occur not regimentally, but in the line in any service, supercession is todescribably mortifying, in the Indian army, tolerable only because the desperate have no remedy To allow promotion by purchase would be a state of things infinitely worse, nor do I think that it would be safe to attempt the introduction of such a measure If promotion were to be obtained by purchase, or by interest, what man would expose himself to the perils of such a climate, where his existence is preserved by one continued struggle? And unless an individual enrolls him self in the Indian service with the prospect of passing the greater portion of his life attached to it, one of the greatest securities England has for the preservation of the country, would be overthrown An officer entering the career late, and for a short period, could feel no interest for soldiers such as the Indian senovs, so foreign in nature and habit, -strangers to him they would always be, and he aliensted from their confidence The fidelity of this extraordinary army is at present matter of fact, not of conjecture ,-but let them have a rapid soccession of European officers, ignorant of their customs and unyielding to their prejudices, and I fear the experiment would tell wofully against those who would hazard it No-an Indian officer must be for many years a fixture, or of no essential advantage to the service to which he belongs service to which no belongs

"There are sundry discussions and approbanions here
"There are sundry discussions and approbanions are
"There are sundry discussions and approbanions are former to the probability of this army's being transferred from the sundry of the sundry of the sundry discussions and the sundry discussions are supposed to the sundry discussions. They anticipate supercession in an aimost unlimited degree, as the inevitable result of amal gamation with the king's—whom they have long considerered, and are likely long to consider, as jealous rividgoverning with avidity those staff employments which, by the constitution of the service, are, in the present posture of things, exclusively appropriated by the Company's off cora. That this appropriation is strictly just, very few uncadet sets his first control to the service of the servi termic climate, are already too thinly scattered. Ooght het be spoiled of his hopes—ought despondency entirely to deaden his energies, for the sake of bestowing these bonon on those who, deserving as they may be, are not ited to this soil—who can always escape from it, by maling scarlifes doubtless, yet without the total run which must attend a Company's officer who resigns at an early period the service on which his subsistence depends—on those who consider themselves as foreign soldiers employed on foreign service, and have neither knowledge of the peculiarities of this army, nor care for its interests all of which are in some sort within the keeping of officers who occupy the higher range of staff employments?

"The possibility of our present regulations being so modified as to permit promotion by purchase or interest, is never contemplated by us without indignation and alarm. You will say that much personal feeling mingles with this assertion, -well, you may receive it with the qualification -for I avow it. It is now some thirteen years since I made the Indian shore, and I am yet two steps from my company Of the staff I have no chance, and I have nelther cash nor interest. With what feelings then must I contemplate the possibility of an amalgamation, which may place me in imminent danger of being superseded by one of your fair faced European-complexioned recruits, who writes 'Honourable' before his name, or comes out in the interest of the minister, or of the minister's private secretary, or, to descend a little lower, of the minister's secretary's head clerk? Would not such a contingency drive an unfortunate devil to mutiny, whose only chance of seeing home again after some thirty or forty years' service, is the returng pay of his rack? It would be a temptation to prostrate one's self at the feet of the Aizam, and to draw one's sword beneath the drapeau of the Musnud

"These, my dear Z—, are details which, dry as they are, will doubtless be interesting to you, who are actually debating, whether your son is to become an actor on this arena or not. It is fitting, also, that I should show you tho picture in another position

"It is true that the golden days of India are over Miltary men do not now acquire fortunes in this country. Exceptions by no means iovalidate my rule, for they exist only because the few have discovered ways and means unknown and inaccessible to the generatity. Still the life of an indian officer is that of a gentleman, and is sufficiently aristocrate to gratify the most fastidious pride He has servants—horses—a hoose—a plentiful table—fine wines—constant bope of an augmentation of income—and, above all—for I speak to the proud—he has consideration,—a place and a right to mingle with the highest. He is at ease in the society of his superiors, because at no very distant day, if he is tolerably fortunate, he is to occupy the same position. He has a place at their tables—a scale their carriages—and is on that easy footing of emisarily which implies essential equality. He is not causably late of all despits, a tyramical commidiant. But these theory of the control of the cont

"However, there is one great consideration which must operate against sending a youth to India, whether in a civil or military capacity If I say that the country,-the soci ety in its general tone and manner, is any thing but favour able to the improvement of the heart or the understanding, I may be told that 'temptation abounds everywhere, and it Thus, be told that 'templation anothing everywhere, and is as vain to look for Plato's republic, as for Utopia.'—
True, but there is a comparative state of things even when absolute perfection is to be found nowhere, and therefore I tell you, in sober seriousness, that for mine own private opinion, no earthly consideration short of rescuing him from absolute starvation should induce me to send a son to this country First, the chances against his living at all are great, as a comparison of the army lists of 1600 and 1820 wilt testify Next, admitting that he has strength of constitution to grapple with the evils that beset him, where,—after a residence of twenty years,—where is his mental, where is his physical energy? At thirty-six he is an elderly gentleman,—with little personal activity,—with an energy generating with interpersonal activity,—while less inclination for intellectual pursuits. At that age he has 'served his time,' as it is called, which means the pre-scribed twenty two years, admitting that he has had no means of availing himself of the thribugh regulation, or has not been home on sick certificate * And then the years absolutely lost to him during that Immense lapse of time for, compared with the duration of life, it is immense The pursuits of his boshood are shandoned, as too toil some for the chimate Emulation affords no stimulus, for he is surrounded by the idle, who, if they secretly respect, openly ridicule him, and lure him to an indolence, or possibly a dissipation, to which the listlessness and languor already unnerving his spirit, too fatally incline him. For the preservation of his health, a ride of some hours at 'morning's prime,' when duty does not prevent it, is absolutely essential he breakfasts, and endeavours to settle himself to serious study. Presently his friend or companion arrives, and proposes a tour of visits, 'as the sun is becoming too hot for any thing like industry' And thus. until two o'clock, which is nearly the hour of tiffin -anoth er hour or two is lost at table, then evening is approaching, and there is the evening ride and the party, and so 'tis midnight' when, jaded and spirit worn, he seeks his uneasy couch, to slumber heavily and unhealthily, or more probably to count the weary moments as they pass so dreamly that he can hear and number their footsteps

"But let me give 'honour where honour is due' I have known in this 'orient land,' many bright and mighty intel lects which predominated over all the physical opposition that might have enthralled them Their flight was hardly to be retarded, and their course was brilliant and rapid, as it was evanescent. Few indeed are the exceptions which can be brought forward to disprove the assertion, that sedentary pursuits in this country cannot consist with existence Few are the constitutions that have vigour to re sist the inroads of climatic disease, whilst the intellect is exerting its strength, and making daily encroachments on the physical energies The most splendidly gifted individual I have known here, placed in a position as advantageous to him as any that could have been selected, carcful to preserve his health by every regularity of exercise, diet, and society, possessing a cheerful temperament, excellent stamina, well regulated temper, and ardent, not to say sanguine mind, is even now fading gradually beneath the influences of this atmosphere Renounce your pur-Renounce your pursuits, is the obvious prescription in his case, which goes to support my assertion, that this country is manifestly obstite to mental culti-ation. And do not charge upon me the folly of attempting to build up a theory on an isolated fact. I adduct this one instance as a prominent illustration of it. I assure you, fancy has had nothing to do in the painting of the picture. I have conjured up no phantasm to amuse you. My talented firend is too realty such, and so circum stanced as I have described him and I am but one of many tho will tell you that Europe or the grave must shortly be his destination, and that of hundreds of equal promise and equally unfortunate.

• After twenty two years service on India, an officer 15 certainted for the on the 10 of hearing, or as in experted the 12 permitted for twenty fire years, including three years for furious. Preparation of after twenty fire years, including three years for furious. Preparation of the twenty fire years, including three years for furious. Proposed of the second for the proposed occurs, if an unfortunate must be compelled by a ck, nees to proceed to Europe for the preservation of his existence. It is hardship county that hat belove all his indian subswarce during that on pulsory at sence, and in some cases the necessity of serving out the juent y two years is the sentence of hardship.

You speak, my good friend, of your boys returning af ter a few years, to break, as you call it, the long line of their Indian residence, to marry, and, by domestic com panionship, to shed a charm over the latter part of their Indian career Waiving the chances against their returning, except under circumstances sincerely to be deprecated, and exclusive, of course, of the possibility of your furnish ing the requisite funds, how are you certain that they will await this epoch before they form a matrimonial engagement? It would be too idle to imagine you innocently ask ing for a pledge from the youths on such a topic, or rely ing on it, if they gave it, and temptation here, whatever you may think of the matter, is great. Two words will explain the causes of its magnitude-idleness and opportu nity Young men have little occupation, and young wo men are accessible. Morning calls lead to evening par ties, and these to firtations, which, for the most part, ter minate, in the east, in niatrimony

"I am no harsh satirist of the female sex, nor of that part of it who are impelled by circumstances to incur the chances of Indian speculation I pity such individuals as unfortunate, as either the victims of adverse circum stances, or the too docale pupils of inteludging friends But, seiting aside every extraneous consideration. I must al ways deem it a slight dimunution of the-I would scarcely say the respectability-but the delicacy that should charac terize the young female—to find her here unmarried be equally true, that Bath and Cheltenham-every public assembly-almost every social amusement-is also a scene for the exhibition of unmarried women-that the object is the same, and that, whilst society wears its present aspect, it must continue to be so-I can but betake myself to the assertion, that the veil of decency is there thrown over the motives It does not stand out so glaringly manifest it is not forced upon the miod of the uninterested bystantier he has the power of coojecturing it to be the effect of so many causes, that he is satisfied not to bewilder himself in the labyrinth' But in this case it is palpable-it is avowed A girl arriving here scarcely affects to cover her real object with any other pretext, nor would the attempt be successful, where the merest novice considers every fresh ar rival as affording a wider range to his fancy, if he be inclined to 'fetter himself' And-I do not attempt to deny exceptions-females so situated are not generally, either by education of intellect or heart, what an intelligent, reflecting, and cultivated man would select as his companion, or what a parental friend and counsellor would point out as a mate befitting his son Many are beautiful, many attractive, showy, well dressed,—of captivating manners Young men soon lose their earliest impressions of the dignity of the female character, and a protracted residence here tends greatly to lower the standard consequently tinsel is often mistaken for gold-the counterfeit for the diamond Your boys, my dear Z-, are, I dare say, as properly tutored as boys can be, and have views as exalted of the perfection of feminine character as their mother's sons ought to possess Nevertheless, their nature is human nature, liable to the same wearing out of old impressions and receiving of new as the nature of others, and therefore, I warn you, keep them from temptation here, where, considering how circumscribed is the circle in which they are to revolve, the snares that beset them are incalculable do you the justice to believe, that they must sadly have deteriorated from the ancient stock, if they could bestow even a passing thought on a woman wholly educated in this country On the tremendous evils consequent on such unions, therefore, I shall not enlarge, and lest you should charge on me a too sweeping censure, I shall have the frankness to acknowledge that, doubtless, exceptions do exist even in this class also, but I still lift up my voice against him who ventures so hazardous an experiment, and all who know what kind of education is to be obtained herewhat are the attendants of the child-and what must necessarily be its first impressions-will unite with me in declaring, that it is indeed a most hazardous experiment

"My professional feelings lead me chiefly, as you will preceive, to military matters, but as fir as my knowledge extends, I would gladly give the benefit of it to your son, the civilian in poise." For him a perfect acquantiance with the native languages and with Persian, is absolutely necessary. Surely to ought to be his first duty to acquire the means of direct communication with those who must appear before him In his capacity of magistrate and judge, as supplicants or criminals. Dreadful is the responsibility.

incurred by him who, sitting on the judgment-seat in this land, trusts to h s vakeels as interpreters I believe those who are best acquainted with the native character, will support the assertion that every Hindoo is accessible to a bribe The extent to which an interpreter may exercise his power of distorting facts, when he translates a case for his superior, is really terrific Who is to accuse him?-Who is to give a counter representation? In vain the wretched victim of injustice prostrates himself, and im plores the protection of the European arbiter of his fate, who can neither comprehend his own foul injustice, nor the sufferer's appeals I would almost say, let no man at tempt to preside on a judicial tribunal who is not compe tent to receive direct the statements and complaints of the suitors as he values his immortal soul. For surely that man perils his everlasting interests who, through idleness or incapacity, is unable to render justice between man and man, and condemns to desolation and ruin family after family, in the wide-extending sphere of his influence. The rich oppressor knows his security, for aware of the va keel's venality, he measures out a gift, and knows that he has triumphed over his poor foe! And the oppressed man says, I have neither gold, nor jewels, nor grain, nor land, and how can I strive with my enemy? And in his despair he raises up his voice and curses 'the unjust judge,' and aurely this is not the curse causeless that shall not come

"Therefore, my dear Z-, whilst things continue in their present state, make James, if you are resolved he shall here fill the magisterial chair, give his days and nights to the study of oriental languages and, so far as it is acces sible, of oriental law as now administered. You will rea dily exonerate me from the charge of recommending an assiduous cultivation of oriental literature on general grounds, on the contrary, I bold that the languages of the East contain no literature that will repay the student for the labour of their acquisition But us every accountable being ought surely to direct his first and most assiduous pursuit to those subjects which will enable him to sustain with honour and rectifude the vocation which he has cho sen, or to which he has been dedicated-as the attractive is always to be sacrificed to the useful-I maintain that, in the present system of things, it is the high and imperative duty of a young man about to enter on a civil career in In dia, to accomplish himself in the study of Eastern languages. I know no being more contemptible than an Englishman dozing on the judicial seat, whilst suits of vital importance to whole families, and sometimes, in their remoter effects, to whole districts, are transacted by his native functionary, who exuits at once in the wealth acquired by his plentiade of power, and in his imperceptible, but real, and, by him well understood, superiority to the inane representative of the nation who are the masters of British India

"You will observe that I have laid considerable stress on the reservation 'whilst things continue in their present state' You will not now for the first time meet with the opinion, that the greatest reform capable of being made in Indian courts of justice, would be the rendering of the English language the mediam by which all legal business Is transacted Such an innovation would be hailed by the native as the dawning of a new era, replete with invaluable blessings to himself and his race As we hold this coun try by the hand of animan more than by the fetters of nower. it is well for the continuance of our rule that, through all his adversities, amidst all the imperfections of our system. a Hindoo still has almost unlimited faith in the integrity of actions cmanating immediately from Europeans Unin telligible as our English alphabetical characters are to the majority, with what confidence will they receive any doc ument written in those unknown hieroglyphics, relying on it as possessing talismanic virtues! I am persuaded, that the introduction of the English language as the medium of all law official business, would diffuse satisfaction amongst an overwhelming aggregate of this population. The best Incentive would be found to direct the pursuits of thehigher classes to the cultivation of English literature, and in time this would descend to the lower grades places of educatian which the policy of government, or the charity of privote societies has established in this eaormaus continent would be more numerously attended and with better effect. The study of our language must con vey with it some insight into the principles of our sciences and our arts, our literature, our domestic polity, our ethics, and our religion The change also would afford employment to numerous individuals of that almost nameless class of human beings, who are called indiscriminately half-castes, Eurasians, and Hindoo-Britons-a class despised, almost emulously, by Europeans and natives There ore peculiarities annexed to the condition of their birth, which at once unite them with their brethren of either na tion, and at the same time draw a strong separating line This onomily occasions an equal anomaly in the legisla ture as it affects them subjecting them to the protections and penalties of the Mussalmann law, whilst their feelings, and the religion they profess, are generally Christian Political degradation is the invariable producer of moral debasement. This ought to be remembered in all our speculations on the condition of this class and their capabilities of improvement. Perhaps no sect in India is niore generally tainted with deep immorality, not to say deprayity, which is reciprocally the cause and effect of the contempt that, as I have just stated, is bestowed on them by Europeans and Asiatics The change in the language used in the legal courts, will afford them the means of respectable livelihood-will remove many of their temptations to dishonesty-and will, consequently, surely but gradually destroy the prejudices against them now existing to so considerable a degree The most influential of the class have attained so much of the spirit of the times, as to bestir themselves by means of meetings, and to manufacture petitions and representations of their grievances, for the consideration of the authorities at home. But in my opinion these petitions ask too largely. The requisitionists require the removal of those disabilities which affect their employment in the very highest branches of both services * Now, as I have remarked, we hold this country partly by opinion, and believe me, many years of progressive improvement must elevate the Hindoo Britons in the estimation of an Indian population, before consider-ations of public advantage will render it expedient to in trust them with prominent and influential situations. The memorials addressed to parliament aim chiefly at exhibit ing the great hardship this whole class sustains in not being intrusted with eminent posts, or at least with the positions of gentlemen They never touch on exclusion from manufacturing, trading, or agricultural pursuits, they desire to be a class of gentlemen-an anomaly in every country where there is no aristocracy And the petitioners seem entirely to overlook the fact, that, in all civilized nations, civil disabilities are naturally attendant on the peculiar cir-cumstances of their birth—indeed, are necessarily attendant, unless all property, all right, is to be thrown into one common mass of mextricable confusion. 'What,' triumphantly asks one of the memorialists, in a published correspondence - what ought the children of gentlemen to be, but gentlemen?' I will tell him plainly, that no lilegitimate child steps into the exact place of his father in any nation where there exists a civilized social compact. Nor can I conceive that the Intermixture of Asiatic blood, admitting that it confers no additional shame, can sanctify such a misfortune, or give it privileges beyond those of individuals dissimilarly situated Shall not the son of a king be a king?—is a question that at once illustrates the absurdity of this argument. Doubt less he shall—and the son of the peer shall also wear his father's erninder tobe and jewelled coronet. But it shall be a son whose birth is sanctioned by the law—not the conventional law of man's convenence only, but the grand elementary law, without the observance of which the base of very pothcal federation must crumble into dust and ashes In this respect the most merciful man must allow it is right and fitting that 'the sins of the fathers should be visited on the children?

This is an Indian colloquishem, intended to describe the two classes of covenanted servants in this country—civil and military

"To return-James, if he enters on the civil career in this country, will find it a certain avenue to wealth, should he be able to resist the temptations which await him at the outset He must necessarily, at the commencement of his service occupy a comparatively undignified position, as the underling of some senior officer This superior may probably be a man whose allowances are more than suffi cient to pay a whole regiment. Encompassed by every luxury that wealth can procure-reduced by indolence to be the actual dependent on the crowd of fawning and obsequious natives, who call him lord, and invoke his favour as their father, their mother, their god'-craving for the ex citement which his nalled and languid mind can find in no worthy pursuit-he may probably be found by his élève verv accessible, and a 'fine generous spirit,' enervated a little perhaps by the severity of the tropical suns What a vast temptation to expense is thus opened to the tyro! He becomes possibly the inmate of a dwelling where luxury is accumulated on luxury, until each indulgence becomes essential to existence Emulous of the example before him. he squanders money with a thoughtlessness exceeding that of the producal Gaming awakes the torpid epirit from its languor, and therefore this excitement is sought with an ardour proportionate to the relief it affords Entertain mer ts, too, are to heighten its zest. Costly yiands and rich wines are to tempt the satiated appetite, and the expensive nautch is to lend its attractions to the exhibition The comparatively small income of the youthful votary of oriental dissipation cannot answer the demands on ithis native assistant, ever on the watch is adroit to discover the precise moment when the offer of his assistance will be most eagerly received That offer is made, and the aid which attends it becomes at length the habitual resource of the unhappy profigate, who, early in his career, looked with contempt on others who had plunged into such an abyss '- 'What ?-so well warned ?-and set fall into the snare of a villanous native servant?' And in the words of Hazael he asks, 'Is thy servant a dog, that he should do 12*

this thing?—And yet Hazael wrought on, to the fulfilment of all those scorned predictions!

" These are the men who can best bear retrenchment, and on them it would produce the greatest possible quantity of The temptation to extravagance, rumous to almost every young officer, whether civil or military, who is drawn within their vortex, would be removed,-the commission of an immense quantity of moral evil would be prevent ed, and demands of economy might be honourably at tended to, without curtailing the few comforts left to the "soldier officer"-as the elégantes of this accomplished so ciety are accustomed to designate officers with their regi ments, in contradistinction to those employed on the staff, -and the experiment might be infinitely less hazardous A malcontent army has effected greater things than a change in the form of a colonial government. The voice of its indignation generally speaks in thunder loud enough to shake the firmest thrones to their foundation. Hitherto safety has been found in the differences of feeling and opinion which have tended to separate the interests of the armies of the three presidencies. But this disunion is gradually thawing beneath the sense of injustice and in jury common to all It would be idle to deny that there u a spirit of disaffection walking amongst the ranks of the Indian army Lethim who doubts it, enter as one amongst them, and of them, as I have done, and then let him pro nounce, in justice and impartiality, whether this fact be so or not The military servant compares his penury with the civil servant's superfluity, and he scorns the prejudice or the ignorance of the government that thus invests his not more useful brother with wealth and privileges to which he must be for years a stranger Look even at the publish ed opinions of many multary men, and then ask, whether there is not danger abroad 2 Whether public journals are the usual vehicles of the sentments of individuals, or of bodies of men?-Discontent is more than "an airy nothing" when it assumes a form so tangible people rarely record opinions which have not previously been disseminated by other means And I repeat it, that t us army is discontented, -that their discontent originates in a great measure from their limited pay being thrown into such strong shadow by the splendid remuneration afforded to civilians-a body of men who, respectable as they may be, might find their places well supplied at half the expense by officers capa ble of occupying any judicial or diplomatic position in this country Compare the career of a Munro or a Malcolm with that of the most distinguished civil servants, and ask wherein is the military man's inferiority?-And believe that the energies of many a Munro and many a Malcolm, are to be found amought then follow soldiers, were circumstances such as to call them to action

You ask, what have we done for India since it came into our hands? In truth, little compared with our power, and the facilities afforded us, but still somewhat, still enough to show that more may be done,—that ways and means abound, and that many avenues of improvement are accessible. Sensibly alive to the superior security to persons and property afforded by British rule, where is the subject of a native prince who does not envy the happier vassal of the Company? Still, against the very cry of the people from some miserable policy or financial expedient, we suffer the shadow of the Aizam's territory to blacken over the very centre of our dominions, and have now added to the blessings enjoyed under native rule by giving independence to his respectable highness of Berar. that the hill of Sectabuldee may again be mundated with British blood! Such native princes are the very Neroes of modern times,-to whom the appetite of blood seems the only one that knows no satiety Ask of the horrors perpetrated in that nest of Arab incendingles,-that Indian Tophet,-Hyderabad! See there, how murder and rapine stalk hand in hand, in the nineteenth century, -in a territory absolutely defended by British troops Inquire into the enormities perpetrated by the petry rajahs of the hills. Ask of officers on detachment, what has fallen under thour immediate cognizance Will you inquire of me, and hear my solitary anecdote? "I commanded, in default of a captain, a detachment of two companies sent to the hills to defend the district A nightly guard was furnished to the rajah of the small territory for the protection of his palace Shortly I began to receive reports from every native officer on this four of duty, of cries heard during the night, of shrieks and groans as of a person in agony Inquiries had been made by sepoys, and the attendants at the palace had cautiously whispered of cruelties perpetrated on the lawful wife of the rajah, for the amusement and gratification of the nautchgirls and other dissolute women, who formed his nightly band of associates Lighted cheroots were applied, as a jest of excellent piquancy, to the tenderest parts of the poor victim's person, and other methods of torture were resorted to, from which an Europeao imagination shrinks with disgust. Having ascertained, as far as I was able, the accuracy of these harrowing details, I awaited, in great anxiety, the arrival of the very influential personage whose province it was to administer justice through a to which a min is driven, who desires to escape from it galling oppression of conscious littleness: Imagine his ecitement when the order for marching arrived! He evdently deemed that the movements of the 17th, under the command of Major Patrick Flannaghan, for such was his cognomen, not only would form events in the chronicles of the year but actually in the annals of the century. At length, after demurs and difficulties which nearly unsettled the brain of the adjutant, and made the quartermaster a skelton, this fine body of men, as the phrase goes, was put in motion

"The journey commenced, by order, precisely at half an hour after sunrise, when we had paraded much longer than we liked, our most accurate commandant keeping his eye fired on the minute-hand of his watch, that we might not move a moment before or after the appointed time Three hours spent beneath a sun gradually advancing to scorch ing power, brought us to the end of our daily journey, when we devoured our breakfast, with what appetite we might cursed the slowness of Indian marching, abused the cook, fined the butler, retired to our separate tents, and fell asleep But these were the halovon days of that memorable march In fact, we had afterwards to pass through a regular campaign against the weather The jungle, as we savanced, became more dense, lofty hills environed us, covered with forests the abode of predatory animals, and that mightest of serpents, the boa constrictor But how the terror of such foes faded beneath the dread of the pestilential va pours which were exhaling around us! Yes, unseason able as it was, contrary to all the calculations of ordinary experience heavy rains deluged the earth, and threatened us with destruction Morning after moining, our fearful eyes saw the heads of the encircling hills veiled in thick black vapour, that was shortly to descend, and assail us as a pestilence. We were encompassed with the rankest vegetation. Our encamping ground was frequently a square of cleared plain barely sufficient to afford space for our tents and juckets for our cattle. Tall trees or lofty forest covered mountains bounded our limited hori you and seemed to st ut in upon us the malaria abounding in the damp ve_ct in in Our auxicus desire was naturally to hasten, by torced marches out of the reach of darger Sicki ess had crept in am most us, and we had daily to witness the sufferings and danger of those nearest and dear est to us Oh in what close brotherhood the tie of com mon danger binds man to man' What an amiable set of being, each deemed the little band of his comrades! We remembered no man's foibles, we were even anxious to view with a charitable eye the follies of Major Patrick Flannaghan. But he would not allow it. In the plenitude of his military zeal, he insisted on observing 'the regulations of the service, to the very letter, the discretionary power which formed a branch of his prerogative, remained like a title in abeyance-nobody benefited by it. We were to march eight or ien miles dully-no more, lest the men should be harassed i-those very men who, lest to the guidance of their own will, would proceed from twenty to thirty, miles daily! Besides all this, we had frequent halts, that 'the men' and their families might recruit; which we trunslated into something nearer the truth, by calling it Major Patrick Flannaghan's tender consideration for Mrs. Flannaghan, and all the little Flannaghans But our patience had yet to be put to a sorer trial We reached the bank of the river, which in its windings several times intercepted our path. A burst of enthusiasm halled, as we thought, the first view of it; but we very soon discovered that the rapture arose from our approach to a pagoda, celebrated . for the extent of its revenue and the number of Brahmins supported there And here, in obedience to that 'wise policy which refrains from interfering with the religious prejudices of the natives,' our gallant major thought it expedient, malgre the danger of the season, the surrounding sickness, the hazards of delay, to halt fue days, that 'the men' might have an opportunity of paying their desotions and making their offerings at this exalted shrine. Priestly craft soon disburdened the pitlable victims of this the most abject superstition that ever enthralled the spirit of man, not of their superfluous rupees only, but of those absolutely necessary for the extrencies of the march Consoquently, during the remainder of our wearisome journey, we heard only bitter complaints of poverty, and witnessed daily scenes of want and privation which a slight disregard of 'the prejudices of the natives' might, in this instance. have averted However, the thing was all according to rule, and I submit to your consideration, whether this is the best possible state of things in a country absolutely under British rule? If we are not to trample on their religrous institutions, does it follow, therefore, that we are to testify extraordinary veneration for them? If we are not . to force the consciences of men, are we to foster their superstition, whilst we cautiously abstain from lending any official sanction to efforts tending to awaken them to a know-ledge of 'a more excellent way?' This excessive caution conspires exceedingly, with the bigotry and the indolence of the Hindoo, to prevent any improvement either in his moral or his physical wants. It appears, under the present system, that the procuring of a certain revenue is the primary object before which every other consideration sinks into nothing ness Look at the country so long a part of the British territory Where are the roads? Where are the bridges? Where are the agricultural improvements? Where are the exhibitions of the effects of mechanical power employed in aiding the fertility of the soil? In vain you will look for these things Over a great portion of the Company's ter ritory, you will find no traces of a road, everywhere you will witness the processes of agriculture and manufacture, amongst the natives, carried on by means of the very same implements as those used by their forefathers a thousand ages since It is hardly credible how scanty are the im provements which have been introduced amongst the Hin doos during our long intercourse with them And look at the miserable economy with which we dole out to them the means of education On the advantages of opening their minds to the reception of knowledge, it would be idle to argue, all mankind seem in this age agreed in the expediency of enlightening the darkness of the ignorant Civil ized Europe abounds with the means of knowledge, and its resources are gradually extending, and penetra ing regions hitherto least accessible to the progress of civiliza tion Britain, foremost in the great race is liberal to pro fusion in her benefactions to mankind Her subjects-her European subjects—find instruction attainable on all sides On them she casts benefits with a generosity that seems boundless Why has she no heart to sympathize with-no hand of assistance to extend to-her brethren-her sub jects in the 'populous east?'

"To bring this interminable letter to a conclusion You

"To bring this interrainable letter to a conclaision You ask me when I shall revisit England, and assure men this time I meditate a return, to fami utrize myself with time I meditate a return, to fami utrize myself with time more civilized relations of your wastern world 1 agree with you, and, beheve me, my inclination lends additional weight to your arguments. Moreover, I am a constant sufferer from affection of the liver, and our medical officer recommends my trying the effect of my native air. What then withholds me? I will tell you a very substantial treason "I're, our noble find wit afford res such an addition to the pay of feutienant which I should receive from my masters in England, as would enable me to exist with some regard to the bare decenness of life. Those said masters would defray the expense of my passage homewards, and the fund would furnish me an equal sum for the return Good. But has it escapped you, as it appears to have escaped them, that a sick man requires medical side, that in England such also feel beyond the limits of the poor man's means, and that they, in their worshipful consideration for the comfort of their servants, have pro vided no medical atterdance for them when sick poor, and perhaps disabled in their course of service they seek again the shores they once unfortunately quitted? Remonstrance and complaint are unavailing-until patience is exhausted. and complaint assumes the attitude of demand-which day is not yet arrived Therefore my dear Z ...... I war with the uncongenial climate, as best I may, for why should I hasten to the country of my love, only to expire with the very clixir at my lips but beyond my reach? Rather let me perish far away from all that is dearest, such a con Summation will leave me at least the chance of believing that I quit nothing in this world worth regretting

"Con over this undigested mass of facts at your leisure, and after deliberation, send your boys to this forient land if you choose 'Your's sincerely"

if you choose

SKETCHES AND HINTS,

SELECTED FROM MY CORRESPONDENCE.

I page say you have forgotten in the comfort of your own house and establishment, all the little mortifications and annoyances of your march to - Travelling in any part of the world is a sore lightener of the purse. Appropos!-I yesterday saw a caricature entitled Phlebotomists, -a stage-coact man, guard, bowing waiter, courtesting chambermaid, and scraping ' Boots" with a porter and one or two others of the same stamp, representing the merciless operators on an unfortunate traveller But alas! what are these musquetoes to the leeches of an Indian march?-with all these unceasing demands, a Journey of two hundred and fifty miles might be easily accomplished for six or seven guineas, whereas ten times that sum would not cover the expenses of your march, commencing with your butler's demands for ropes, gannies, naching-cases, Ac .- your cook's for store of provender .- advance to servants, bullock men coolies, bearers lascars, &c ,-lm positions of ditto, with which the poor traveller is com pelled to comply at the hazard of being left in the lurch by a general desertion. This is indeed enough to produce a hemorrhage However, I hope, as you seem comfortably settled, some time will clapse before you are again exposed to this species of bleeding. The longer you remain in India, and the more you see of Anglo Asiatics, the more just will you find one of your early observations to me that "the pupels seem to be not ing set parts". Men of education must be scarce amongst those whose lives, from fifteen years of peg, have been spent in this country. Men of scane are also rare, because, in observing orders, there is no room left for the exercise of the reason or judgment, and a soldler is o mere passite machine. Men of 'eggant and refined menners are still more rare, because these can be acquired only by associating with eigent and refined people, and to the first class of society in India such are not to be found, since the highest situations are open, by progressive promotion, to persons of whatever birth education, or intellect. And as to men of fashion or ton '-Yet each of these classes of character finds would be representatives in abundance, and men of a little tact contrive to pass for what they would seem, among people not very conversant with the matter of exhibition One of the most atrocious buoglers at this would be sys tem is our colonel commandant, for of all assumptions that the spirit of imitation could have put into his head. that of dignity, consequence, or gentility, by such an un-derbred uneducated being, is the most ridiculous He still talks of going home, but, unless driven by ill health, I am confident he never will, for he must have a most especial dread of the levelling nature and effects of English society. in which a laced cost and peons, and chobe dars, would hardly sustain him in what he might consider his proper grade, but where divested of these, he must sink at once to the very humble place which I would assign him With all his failings, I should scarcely like to risk a change these days so much encouragement is given to the vilest underhand reports of commanding officers, that one's anpointment or even commission is liable to be put in jeopardy by the mere insedirit of one of them In this respect - is a safe man for though he will not scruple at obtaining information by the most despicable means, he seems to seek it only for his own private gratification, I have never known an instance of his making any injurious secret statement to head-quarters, or indeed of his taking any unfair advantage to get people into trouble The -tee mode of procedure in this way is the most disgraceful I ever heard of,-but to every honourable feel ing and every upright principle, the officer at the head of the force is so notoriously a stranger, that all comment on his baseness would be but an echo of everybody's opinion Indeed the whole system of army discipline is becoming daily more and more galling to every honest and independent mind

ŗ

The excitement caused by our preparations for that threatened march to the capital, has long since subsided, and we have as long relapsed into our wonted state of quet and comfort, which had for some days been scarced away from our abode by the aforesad "note of preparation". Since then, we have had the visitings and visitance of the new arrivals, whose debth promises to leave us, on the whole, no occasion to recret the change. The plat regiment have brought us two suble fair ones—one of them of a pleasing and rather rensible cast of countenance, but her mind can have had little culture, the other has never been in the habit of doing lady, and prefers spending her time in chewing betel, and lounging about her house dechaussee, to enduring the infliction of visits which would impose a most awkward degree of restraint on her manner, no less than on her feet, accustomed as they are to unhosed freedom. The commandant is supe-Tior to the class in general, he is not a Tartar, neither is he supme, nor careless It is a difficult matter to meet with a good commanding officer now a days, as has been my observation for the last twenty two years, and it always will be a matter of rare occurrence, because the situation requires a greater combination of natural good qualities, than we, from the habit of seeing it filled by very inferior persons, are at first sight disposed to admit I regret to learn that you have so much annoyance on this score, but, alas! a military life, is a life of annoyance-of submission -of the constant sacrifice of our own will, to the orders of those whom chance may constitute our masters for the time being. Thank God, thought remains free amidst this thraldom of words and actions, but these must be submit ted to the bridle, how much soever we may chafe and fume at the tyranny of our riders

My crime, I suspect in the eyes of my corps is not matiimony, as you conjecture but my return to active service after two visits to England for health. This is the "head and front of my offending" with the young gentlemen of the 71st, I beseech you, there fore, mortify all unknown inquiries by assurances of my most substantial health, and most invilable determination to stick to the service until I am a leutenant colone, the point at which I shall crease to have say

immediate influence on their promotion

and the control of th

thoughts by day, my dreams by night," are occupied by this one absorbing subject-the means and the period of my return to England Have you seen the scheme circu lated, by the authority of government, in the Bengal army. for forming a RETIRING FOVD? There are many very object tionable points in it, but I should be glad to see something of the kind set on foot amongst us The principle of the Ben gal scheme is, to have two classes of annuitants, the one for officers of twenty two years' service, with an annuity of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, in addition to the retiring pay of their rank the other for officers of twenty six years' service, with an addition of two hundred and fifty pounds per annum, the number of annuitants to be eight of one class-seven of the other. The evils of this will be evident to you however, as it would bring so many pensioners on the company at home. I put no faith in their assenting to it. Among the many alterations projected and rumoured, this one of the retiring fund is the only one that wears even a possibly promising aspect Every other aims at reduction, either in numbers or income

I am indeed sorry to hear that the climate is already ba ginning to affect your energies, marvel not therefore, that my poor addlepate is reduced to a state of Bootian stupid ity I never passed so unprofitable a month in my life as the last No regular reading but flying from book to book, and lounging and sauntering about the house, my best em ployment during the fifteen hours of daylight being a romp with the children, and the heat renders even that almost a puinful exertion both to them and me A steady, strong, and blazing hot land wind, that would raise the thermometer twenty degrees above this year's average in exposed situations, would not be half so oppressive as the close, coast like weather of this season My fear is, that our monsoon may be a little late, as, notwithstanding frequent thunder showers and squalls, I do not perceive any of the usual symptoms of an approaching fall of heavy and continued rains It requires a little deluge to cool the hissing earth, and clear the steamy atmosphere

On looking to your letter, I perceive the leading article to be the producy of a married cade. Envisible man I What a prospect lies before him! the vista terminating in the rank of brigatine general, at the age of sevenly two, according to the recent arrangements, and the foreground of the prospective holding out the cheering view of ten vears' enjoyment of the exhibitanting life of a married en sign! If the lady were an atom less flippant, vulgar, and self satisfied such a prospect would break her heart', but the providence that tempers the wind to the shorn lamb supplies the capacity of endurance according to the inflic-tion of the burden You see, the threatened reduction in numbers has taken place, so that we swarm with supernumeraries, and yet every fresh ship pours out a flock of cadets, to swell the list of sufferers I think all ensigns of any respectability of family, connexion, or education, would be wise in returning home, for there is no pursuit to which they could devote themselves as gentlemen, in which they would not have attained greater advantages at the end of twenty five or thirty years, than they have any prospect of attaining by continuing in this service. Few will be better off than myself, when as far advanced in their probation, and I hourly regret having wasted my life so un profitably Notwithstanding the many and thankfully acknowledged blessings with which I am surrounded, I cannot help feeling a most ardent longing to exchange the luxuries of the East for the simplest fare and most homely establishment of rusticated gentility in happy England, and hinc ille lachryme for the conviction that I could scarcely have failed to realize so moderate a desire by twenty two years of apprenticeship to any gentlemanly calling at home adda a feeling of remorse to the mortification of disap nointment

In the late arrangements, much dipiomatic cunning is displayed the upper branches of the service are furnished with a sop to quiet their bark, if disposed to abet the clam ours of the unfledged younkers. As to the brevet rank for gallantry in the field, it is only an additional incentive to abuse of patronage, which, Heaven knows, flourishes abundantly, without such extra temptation. Fortunately for all but the few elite, who might have a chance of being put over the heads of their contemporaries, there is little prospect of this new regulation's coming into practice at present, as the peace of India seems likely to be undisturbed for many years thus we shall, for a time at least, escape supercession by military secretaries, aids-de-camp, el hoc genus omne, the only class to whom the benefits of this specious promise of honorary promotion would ever extend The late order for the examination in Hindostance, of officers either holding staff appointments, or candidates for them, is an absurd farce, its only object being the extension of patronage. If the commander in-chief would make a regulation, and honestly observe it, that every officer who has not satisfactorily passed through the ordeal of the prescribed examination, and may be nominated to the staff, shall after six months' interval undergo this examination, and, if he be not adequately acquainted with the language, shall lose his appointment, then the procedure would wear the semblance of benefit to the service But, prophetic from the past, I foresee that such infortunates as owe their advancement to an influence that exists only in the preter pluperfect tense, or have rendered themselves in any way obnoxious to the adminis tration that is, will be the sufferers, and their places will be supplied by the satellites of the actual greatness of the day whose incompetence will be no bar to their fortune over the world there is a cry against the abuse of patron age, and there is no spot in the babitable globe where it exists to so disgraceful an extent as in India How can it be otherwise? There is no public omnion—there is a fet tered press-and where exists the presumptuous individual who would dare to assert of himself that, placed within similar temptation, unchecked by these essential restraints, he would not equally offend?

To fill up my sheet, shall I send you a portrait of a true Indian officer of twenty years' standing—a perfect specimen of the class having lately joined our society?—Captain M. is a very stout, or in less courtly terms, a monstrously fat, good tempered man At this season he seems oppressed and depressed by the heat, from which he suffers severely. and his large Atlantic countenance has the relaxed appearance of one gasping for life His manner is cheerful and agreeable, his conversation rather matter of fact than speculative-the fault of all Indian conversation. He likes books, but I fear his fondness is confined to the enhemera of the day, or, at best a striking novel of the higher order He has outlived his penchant for military occupation, if he ever had it, and I think the most annoying circumstance of his life is the necessity of attending a drill or parade His wife is natural in thought and manner—quite free from all affectation -cheerful, conversable, and clever Their dispositions, moreover, are decidedly sociable, and this, like the hospitality of India, being a much rarer virtue than of yore, is of course valued the more highly of yore, is of course valued in more nightly With regard to the reception, and its sequences, which you experienced from "the upracht and learned judge" of our Zullah, I can only say, that even allowing for the diminution, just alluded to, of the once far famed Indian hospitality, this breach of it outherods Herod" You had arrived after a long and dangerous march—were compelled to take refuge during the hottest season in a house which nothing but the direct necessity could have induced a European to infaint for a day—were naturally without the usual comforts belonging to a settled residence—were sick even unto death"—two days' march from your regiment and your friends,—and this man—this married man—stood entirely aloof—without onechsafing so much as one inquiry whither you yet existed — I his is a civilian of the present day—to whom his military brother is an alien and a foreigner! However, I have done—Allow me only one growl at the authorities at home, with whom rests the root of the matter. If Ay will they not open their eyes to the fact, that this country is in the power of it eir military servants and that let the tug of war come, their whole posse of judges, collectors, and magistrates, will be but as dust in the balance!

CAPTAIN MAPLE'S MISFORTUNES.

' THE Manies are a very ancient family, as all the county of Kent can testify They have lived in one spot for many generations, deviating in nothing from the quiet maxims of their ancestors, preserving the same essential characteristics amidst all the various changes of the signs of the outward man and woman, from ruf's and brocades. -slashed coats and doublets,-to bare necks and firmsy hatistes.-Wellington trousers and frock coats Still the Maples of Mapleton Hall were the Maples of Mapleton Hall, lords of the manor, esquires of the village, and layimpropriators of the Rectory thereof, as is abundantly testified by the fact that since the days of the reformation, the incumbent has always been a 'Reverend Matthew Manle' But it was the fortune, good or bad, of my father to deviate so far from the established practice of his progenitors. as to become the head of a very numerous proguny Of these I was the cadet.- I mean no pun,-simply the cadet of the family Now it was manifest that the positions of 'Phomas Maple, Esquire, of Mapleton Hall,' and 'the Reverend Matthew Maple,' could be occupied by only two out of the seven goodly sons at present flourishing as olive branches about the table of the hall. The family dignity was to be preserved, but then the family means! third son was fixed on as the physician in posse, since with the Maple connexion, my mother said, he must find ample practice .- the fourth was destined for the bar, where that said flourishing connexion was still to scatter the roses of success along his path Yet there remained three unfortu nate superfluities, in whose veins flowed that blood which, it was contested, would be polluted by the vile adulteration of trade, the apothecary's shop, or the lawyer's office by means of the oft insisted-on connexion of the Maples, my bro her Stephen was sent to India in the civil service, --lucky dog '-Hal in the engineers' department, -- and 1-I-Peter Maple was told to be very thankful for an infantry cadetslup

"So I blessed my stars, and I was thankful And when the shake and feather were exhibited,—and the scarlet and gold, and the epaulet and sword,—I was thankful exceedingly

"The service has not in the whole line a more contented officer than I am It seems to be the peculiar happiness of my temper to be thankful for all that befalls me No light grievance would have opened my eyes to unpleasant pros pects, or have driven me to the expedient of recording my misfortunes I was eighteen years a subaltern, was thankful for the brevet when it came to my turn, and morethank ful still for my company when I got it After this happy occurrence, in an evil hour I took unto myself a wife, after the manner of the sons of men, that is by asking and hav ing Not that I mean to insinuate any thing discourteous regarding Mrs Captain Maple, whom I am bound to support and protect at the peril of life and limb Nevertheless, for I hold myself bound to write the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, it does occasionally occur to my imagination, that things might possibly have worn a more comfortable aspect, if there had been no Mrs Captain Ma ple at all

"My wife was a great manager, and a capital economist. Therefore, from morning to night she was wrangling with the butler for annas and pice -converting her boudoir, as she christened the verandah fitted up for her sitting room, into a bar of litigation, where she accused one servant and received the depositions of others for and against, to my everlasting annoyance The consequence was, my estabhishment was always fluctuating, and amongst the figures which occasionally flitted for a short space before our eyes in the character of attendants, it is scarcely to be supposed that all were honest men silver spoons and forks began gradually to disappear, and who conveyed them away? Alas discovery in such a case was nearly as hopeless as recovery in India So I mourned over my losses with a gentle grief, which, however, my contented temper permit ted not to be of long duration And when, by the particular excellence of my wife's careful surveillance of our menage, I found debts accumulating whilst my pay disappeared as soon as it was received,—I resigned myself to the grievance, by taking to my heart the consoling conviction that as I enjoyed good health in this country, it mattered little whether I passed the remnant of my days here or In a more westerly direction I confess I have lived out many of my early feelings, to me, after an absence of five and twenty years, my brethren must be strangers, and every familiar thing of my own home has doubiless disappeared beneath the encroachments of newer fashions and modern improvements

"When Mrs Captain Maple was made aware of the actand extent of our debts by the correspondence of certain shopkeepers, who are always civil enough to remove any doubts of this kind in which you may fondly indulge, she vented the usual abuse of their impertinence, audacity, and presumption, and then finally suggested as an advisable expedient, that I should apply without delay to my brother —the civilian.

"Sooth to say, I am a man not much given to correspondence. If my finends visit me, I am glad to see them, if they write to me, I am glad to hear from them, but to be compelled to answer every letter with which the idlers of one's acquantance may be pleased to favour one I hold as a tay on a man's time and patence. which I for one, always decline paying

"Stephen and I, therefore, had exchanged letters once in three or four years I saw occasionally by the newspapers, that he had passed through successive steps to the position of circuit judge, and I knew consequently that his receipts were assuredly not less than three thousand rupees monthly Avertheless, I had never asked any favour at his handa, and notwithstanding our consonguinity, I am inclined to think he was almost the last man on early to whom I should have applied for pecuniary assistance, if the importanties and harangues of Mrs Captain Mapidad bad been but one tithe part less than they were Lake the unjust judge of the parable, I complied, because 'she wearded me,' and of the two evils I chose the least

"My brother's answer arrived, pithy and laconic I have preserved it as a future warning for the excellence of the advice it contains Here it is

DEAR PETER,

"I accure yours of the 7th, just as I was preparing for my circuit. Consequently it came in a very unlacky hour, first, because I am almost too busy to answer it, and secondly, because I want every cash? I can raise in the world. How upon earth can you have managed to get into debt? You have had captain's pay these six or seven years, and have had little expense. You military men are, usay the truth, very imprulent—the most thoughtless set of people extant. However, it will not do for me to follow your example; I hate a creditor, and therefore never mean to be in debt. It is useless your applying to me, I am a family man, and have demands quite equal to my income

'If your trades people dun you, burn their letters, and if they become impertment, threaten them with the insolvent act. At all events, I recommend you to clear yourself as soon as you can

'Offer our kind regards to Mrs Maple We hope to meet you some of these days

Yours sincerely,

STEPHEN MAPLE

"I put the letter quietly into the hands of Mrs Maple, who raved at the hard heartedness, avarice, and unbrotherly meanness of my brother, until she had fairly exhausted the whole nomenclature of invective. In vain I asked her what was the advantage of a passion which injured nobody in the world but her own excellent constitution? All the thanks I received for my affectionate represents tions, were reproaches for the meanness of my milk and watery spirit, which inclined me to submit to so much in solence I have generally found imperturbable silence to be the best shield against an arrow flight of these conjugal sugar plums, to which, therefore, I betook myself, and in process of time, the storm, violent as it was, blew over

"It pleased Mrs Captain Maple at length, however, to take it into her head that my promotion was proceeding at a remarkably slow pace, and she forthwith began to give her days and nights to the army list.

"Captain Simkins, the senior of my captains, was in Europe on sick certificate, Captains Barnes and Payne, the two next in succession, were, like me, doing regimental duty at our head quarters

"Suddenly, to my unbounded surprise, for it was very contrary to her wont, Mrs Captain Maple hegan to testify a most uncommon degree of satisfaction in their society I am, I confess, glad to see my friends occasionally, but I like sometimes, and for the most part, a quiet dinner in a family fashion, therefore I did not deem the frequent presence of Payne and Barnes remarkably pleasant, but remonstrance with Mrs Captain Maple on such a point was, I knew, a thing not to be ventured, and I was fain to put up with the nuisance .

" Magnificent were the repasts which at these times loaded our board Mrs Captain Maple, amongst other ac-complishments, was well skilled in Ude, and mets of the most piquant and spicy flavour, tempted the appetite. But they did more, they excited thirst, which, my propen sities not being in any manner bibulous, was less injurious to me than to most. Moreover, I am addicted to ginger beer, but Payne and Barnes were unflinching vota ries of Hodson, and they consumed bottle after bottle, with a rapidity that helped greatly to swell the amount of my mess bill, without any adequate benefit to themselves Then, when Mrs Maple retired from the table, lest we should wax dull or sober, she was careful to provide us with a supply of devilled turkey and biscuits, grilled salted herrings, sardinies, and other sach atimulating provocatives, which tempted my guests to a sederunt stretching far into the night, for I ought to state that these dinners always took place between seven and eight P M

"In vain I remonstrated, I prayed to be allowed to go quietly to bed at nine o'clock, at least six nights out of the seven Mrs Maple's orders were imperative on this head And when I humbly asked what good was to result and whether our debts must not awfully accumulate from such proceedings, I was told to consider myself a compound of stupidity and ingratitude, utterly unworthy of the blessing Heaven had bestowed on me, in providing me with a guardian angel, who was so anxious for my best interests, and whose single object was my advancement.

"What could I say in answer to such declarations?-Though a soldier, I am a man of peace, and inclined to taka every thing as quietly as may be, though, indeed, sometimes I felt a perturbation which I had great difficulty in allaying without being guilty of an access of passion very injurious in a chimate in which there exist reasons manifold, but best to be nameless, why none of us can take things coolly

"Mrs Keith, our adjutant's wife, absolutely rushed from her palankeen into our ball one morning, breathless, evidently with some overwhelming intelligence. I was terribly afraid poor Keith had met with some accident, for I knew he had been at guard mounting in the morning as adjutant of the day, and I expected he had, as usual, gained the honours of the field, with less than his usual impu-But my fears on this head were soon relieved nity But my lears on unsured was addressing Mrs Maple as soon as she recovered the power of speech, 'have you heard the news from Europe?

"'Not a word -not a word !- what is it? I am dving to hear" said Mrs Maple, with extraordinary eagerness

"Such a step for the corps" returned Mrs Keith And really it is so very anfortunate! Poor Simkins! I knew him well-a kind hearted, good creature! However, he has fortunately left no wife or family, and as it has happened, you know, my dear Mrs Maple, it is of no use grieving over what is in fact a positive good to one's self.

Keith is now next for his company?

"Well, really, yes now you mention it, I do think I have observed something of the kind," returned Mrs Keith "He has a very short neck too, and is so thick set, that I only wonder he has lasted so well in this climate. Poor mail we respect him very moch. His step would give Keith his company?

"Very true, have you heard the report that the major is likely to be superseded, if nothing worse occurs on ac count of that affair of Laul Mahommed's, the Subidar ma jor, you know?' and Mrs Maple's voice softened to an absolute whine 'Poor, dear man! I am sure it would break his heart! And he is the best of creatures-quite a prince of a commanding-officer, so anxious for the comforts of the married men! I shall really be truly grieved if they take a severe view of the case at the adjutant general's of fice. Certainly, strange views of things are taken there, and examples must occasionally be made, I only hope it will not fall on the poor major, who, by the way, I am sor ry to hear, has lost all his interest at head-quarters lately He will never survive supersession, he has always made himself so sure of the command What a step that would be for Captain Barnes ' Apropos! do you not think Barnes looks quite healthy just now?

"There I cannot agree with you, my dear," and Mrs Keith, making precisely the answer which I well knew Mra Maple must have anticipated "I think poor Capitaln Barnes is the most cadaverous booking personage in the whole corps, really he is an absolute skeleton—a walking death! And such a produgious gourmand! It is really quite surprising how very thin a man get by eating himself trio constant surfeits !

"And Mrs Keith departed to spread the Intelligence of the Important step through the cantonment, with the supplement, I knew, of course, 'that really Captain Maple looked so bihous, there was little prospect of his living to at tain the majority 1

"My wife was so profuse in her expressions of grief for the death of Simhans, that I saw plathly enough the whole population began to understand and relish the joke." The youngsters made more frequent morning-calls than ever and by dexterously turning the conversation into the requisite channel, they never failed to extract the amusement they desired from Mrs. Capitain Maple's mourning peal AI length my annoyance obliged me to venture a duriful remonstrance, and to state that 'poor Simkins' was actual by becoming a catchword at every mess in the place. Mrs. Maple boldly questioned the authenticity of the fact, desired me to plod along my own dull way, and not to attempt to check her less timid progress! I was indignant enough, but having some respect for my comfort, which is indissolubly connected with quiet, I held my peace, and she went on after the devices of her own heart, and prospered

"But the catalogue of my misfortunes is far from complete I bought a horse, a fine, noble-looking animal, from a lot of Arabs, with great pride I mounted him, but pru dently tried him, on my first essay of his qualities, by walking him gently through a quiet, retired by road, almost like an English lane He answered admirably, and I, as it was the monsoon, allowed him, during some weeks, to re pose idly in the stable. The Arab dealer had left the place very soon after the purchase was concluded, and I thought no more of him until my syce brought me frequent notice, that if the animal encountered a tree, a bandy, a pajankeen, or vehicle of any description, he not only shied, but actually plunged and reared, so that he could with difficulty be held down. I remembered the price I had paid for him, and was sufficiently sorrowful, moreover, I did not like the anticipation of Mrs Maple's reproaches Consequently, I was the more grateful for her forbearance when I discovered, to my surprise, that she said nothing about the matter

"Captain Payne was a daring rider, and he had been greatly capturated by the extentor of the horse, and certainty a creature more finely limbed, or with a more beau tiful head, never attracted the purchaser. Payne ind intimated to me has desire of trying has paces, but I refused, on the plea that the animal was not safe. Mrs Maple ridi culed my timidity, and suggested that that might be a very hazardous experiment for me, which Captain Payne might venture with impunity Payne was well pleased with a compliment to that equestrian skill on which he moved himself, and pressed for the loan of the horse However, I was glad that he went away, and whether from forget fulness, or that he changed his miod, he never sent to me for him

"I recollect it was early in the morning in May, when I was sitting with my hookah in the outer verandah, enjoying the only cool moment that was to impart energy to endure the next twelve torrid hours, when my attention was excited by an appearance of great bustle in the street of the cantonment. Naturally anxious, as every resident in India is, to know what occorrence could occasion it, I called a serdar and sent him to inquire He returned with an answer which I shall never forget Being translated, it ran thus -

"'Payne saib rode out this morning on master's horse That horse took too much fear at a carriage in the gen eral's lines,-Payne saib fell off, then the horse kicked and ran away, and the syce fetched the doctor saib, and they put Payne saib in the palankeen, and then they took him home

"I trembled with horror,-I felt deadly sick, and s cold perspiration burst from every pore I rose and went hastily to Mrs Maple's apartment, and asked her if she had lent the horse to Captain Payne that morn ing?

"And what if I did?" was her reply in irate accents
"Why, if you did, Mrs Maple, said I, for I waxed warm, and indeed was absolutely in a passion—if you did, the horse has thrown Payne, and he is badly hurt—perhaps a fractured himb—perhaps dead—and that's what it is, if you did, Mrs Maple—and if he should die, you will, and ought, in your conscience, to know that you have killed him, Mrs Maple -And I wiped my face in an

Lay down my pocket handkerchief, Captain Maple, sir,—how dare you insult me, your lawful wife, with such vile insinuations?—Sir, I despise and trample on both them and you '-Did I tell the horse to throw Captain Payne,did I ask Captain Payne to mount him ?- You told him enough of the brute's violence, and If his vanity led him -But it is idle to waste words on you. If he is dead, I am clear of the business, that's all-and it is another step, and that's more-and don't come here troubling me again, SIT 13

"Poor Payne did die, and night after night I dreamed of Mrs Maple's forcing him upon the horse, all unsaddled and unbridled, and methought I haw her uritating the animal, by the aid of sharp steel, to plonge and rear, until the unfortunate horseman was thrown, and I saw his pallid face, and mangled body. And then I awoke in horror; and frequently I found my sile in happy slumber, wrapt in blissful dreams, and I could hear gliding from her lips in tones that were complacent even in aleen, "Maor Ma-

ple-Major Manle P

"My misfortunes seemed to have reached their climar, it fancied, whenever poor Payne's death was discussed, and every cye turned with suspicion on me. Many a gibe and joke occurred on the occasion from the youngsters, such as—"Lucky horse that of yours, Maple "—"Well, Maple, that horse of yours will take you to the winning post one of these days!—"I say, Maple, what is the price of your horse Promotion in our corps is at a dead stand, and our major is looking out for a horse P-Yours is just the animal to anit us "—and many such like lineadocs, which pained me exceedingly, from a certain unpleasant consciousness, of which I could not, for the life of me, divest myself.

"As to Mrs Maple, since this event occurred, she has given invations to Barnes, the survivor, more frequently than ever Often when I have recommended claret to thin in preference to brandy, have I suffered martyrdom from the sharp application of her foot under the table to mine, which unluckly is afflicted with three or four bad corns I—Nay, to my surprise, she purchased a four dozen case of prime cognize from the captain of a French vessel, whose ship put into the neighbourhood for repairs, although brandy pas need is a beverage which I utterly abominate. With what terror that is see it conveyed from my own house, accompanied with a nicely written chil from hersel!—It is a present to poor Barnes," sad she — he is really such a good and of must that it wish to show him a little atten-

"However, Barnes, cadaveroos as he looks, has a constitution of excellent stamma, and has hitherto been proof against all Mrs Maple's little attentions:—He accepts the brandy, indeed, and I have reason to think that he drunk at —but it is, by some happy adaptation of his nature to alcohol, a source of harmless exhibitation only—in fact a medicine. I have done with reasonstrances, which only tend to exhibitions of strife—which I hate—and they are utterly useless. I have found some relief in putting to priper this catalogue of my misfotimes, the seventy of which will be perfectly understood by every old officer who has lived in India long enough to prefer ease and peace to every other earthly blessing, and who has a yoke fellow so active, so enterprising, so vigilant an arraros in his bhalf, as Mrs Captain Maple has demonstrated herself in mine?

A RECOLLECTION.

The arrival of a ship from England fills every heart with anx ety and expectation, from the highest official anticipating documents of importance, to the petty dealer who looks for some addition to his means of barter. There are few so cold as not to desire news from home, and fewer still an indifferent to their own interests, as to be careless of the influence her despatches may probably have upon their desting.

But there are times and occasions, in which the anticipated signal of arrival is looked for with more intense interest. And no circumstance perhaps was capable of exciting deeper feelings than that which had drawn Moraunt from his sleepless couch, and brought him to the beach ere yet the first red light of dawn lay upon the eastern wave

With straining eye he gazed upon the waters, and much and earnestly he communed with himself. Over the anxiety indicated in his eye, there was superinduced an expression of regret, and of that self dissastiaction which is so betrayed by resiliess and unequal motion. Sometimes he paused, and whilst every sense appeared absorbed in contemplating the trackless expanse before hun, his view was really turned so completely on himself, as to exclude all outward objects.

Five years ago he also had been a wanderer on that deep, and had first anchored on this sunny shore Adwell he remembered how, at that moment when he foot pressed first the eastern world, the pang of regret smote his breast for the loss of the very object whose restoration he was now anticipating. And why bounded not his heart now, as lightly as it would then bave bounded, at such restoration? Alas' man's bopes—any, sadder still, man's 'affections—are as fieting as time tiself?

He had then attained a more advanced period of life than is usual with those entering the military career in India. He had been in the world long enough to have imbibed a passion, which, if not deep, was so vivid, that he at least believed it eternal It was only within the last two short months he had begun to suspect in himself the possibility of change, and the season of doubt had arrived too late

From his very earliest days, Helen Manners had been the object of his boyish attachment. When those years of boyhood had passed away, still she was the idol of his young heart, for a fairer creature, more rich in health, gayety, all the loveliness of bloomy youth never lighted on this earth He loved her, therefore,—that is, as well as such a nature could love He delighted in the treasure, for the possession of which many sighed

But friends frowned on that youthful passion, and his destination in life was determined accordingly Mordaunt, having been attached to some militia regiment in England, entered the Company's military service as he verged on his twenty fifth year But Helen and he parted not before vows had been exchanged, solemn as vows can be that are not sanctioned by human institutions, and in one heart at least, the record never was effaced

As years had waned, so successive changes had dim med Helen's prospects, as those of her lover had brighten ed One hy one her relatives sank into the slumber of death, and amongst the few who remained, she dwelt on a scanty competence With Mordaunt, the case had been reversed. He had made for himself many influ ential friends, who had essentially served him. His promotion in his regiment had been fortunately rapid and he had been also appointed to one of those offices which sometimes render an Indian career delightful To do him justice, his first desire was, that Helen should share his prosperity and his advancement. And if sometimes the consciousness that her beauty and sweetness would not to say the least, mar the brightness of his course, mingled with the purer elements of his feeling, let the earthiness of our nature be remembered, and this alloy forgiven

To Helen therefore he wrote n passionate request that she would venture to this distant land for his sake, and find her reward in the devotedness of his love, the engrossing of his entire heart Helen's few remaining friends still opposed the union but she awakened from the torpid melan choly into which frequent sorrows had plunged her, bound ed once more to hope and joy, and resolved on rejoining

the lover of her youth

And Mordaunt,-alas' he had recently awakened to the conviction that a higher prize was in his grasp if he ex tended his hand to receive it -that he might ally bimself above his most ambitions hopes .- become the envy of his rivals and the superior of his equals .- and-Helen was at hand!-was it possible this conviction could touch one chord of his bosom that vibrated with other than rapturous delight? Mordaunt indulged a secret sigh that the possible brightness of his fate had not earlier dawned on his men tal view, and then resolutely endeas oured to fix his thoughts on the truth, the tenderness, the loveliness, the vivacity, of his all but wedded Helen

The ship arrived at length, but it was many days after his early walk on the beach to look out for her arrival, and he was some miles distant from the presidency, when he received intelligence that Helen was safely lodged in the house of the friend who had volunteered to receive her The business in which he was engaged, imperatively com manded his longer absence, and he spent the interval in endeavours to shake off the now certain disappointment of the ambitious plans he had for one moment indulged The compulsive absence, however, ended, and he hastened, with a heart trembling with a tumult of mingled and conflicting emotions, to the abode of his betrothed "You will find Miss Manners in very delicate health," said his friend, "and your arrival has agitated her exceedingly almost fear that she is not likely to encounter the trials of this climate with impunity "

Mordaunt entered the apartment where Helen, in an anxiety that defies description, awaited his approach. He entered, and one glance rooted him, to the snot Heaven, how you are altered! were the only words of greeting that welcomed the woman who had forsaken home, friends, and country, for him

Helen sank again on the seat from which she had risen The hand that was extended, but not touched, fell cold and powerless by her side She read with one glance in his dismayed eye, all of disappointment-all of astonishment and-displeasure-that actually struggled within him. That single sentence had sufficed to tell the story of the change of both-his heart and her person From that moment the fate of the unfortunate was decided

It began soon to be rumoured at the presidency, that matters were not altogether in train for Mordaunt's nun tials-an event that had been anticipated during many There were floating reports abroad, that his conduct to his francee had been any thing but manly and hon ourable, and it was quite certain that the lady who had received Miss Manners, no longer opened her door to him Comments soon ceased to be whispered in a society not likely to tolerate any action so manifestly base, and opinons were loudly and broadly expressed, that Mordaunt owed at to the community to explain the circumstances under which he was acting Terrified at the probability that this untoward occurrence might ultimately hlast his prospects, Mordaunt flew to the highest official authority, and pleaded his own cause skillfully. He declared that he had been willing and eager to fulfil his engagements with Miss Manners, and that from some inexplicable captre, she had rejected him after undergoing all the fatigue and privation of so long a voyage for the avowed purpose of uniting herself with him. And so he won the ear of a man not much addicted to the practice of separating the false from the true, and never able to resist an appeal that flat tered his own desire of superiority

In a few weeks Helen Manners lay quedly beneath the simple white mooument oo which her name was recorded. And very few months had revolved, when Mordaumt became the triumphant husband of the woman whose alliance promised to relaize his most ambitious dreams. Hitherto, his course has been prosperous, and this episode in his early life is forgotten.

COLONEL SCOVELL.

Penaus in every army there exists some individual so peculiar that he is known in each regiment, and through all departments Regmental messes indulge in animated accussions on his merits, and his "manner of life and conversation" formish anecdotes and amusement to half the societies of which the multiary form a component part. The first inquiry a stranger makes as he rides through the cantonment of -- pore, on the evening of his arrival, concerns the name and occupation of an individual, who immediately attracts his eye by the meanness of his air and the shabbiness of his appointments albeit the horse he rides is as gallant a charger as ever carried knight to tournay. attention is absorbed by the equestrian himself. A plain hat of antedituvian form, the hue of which has long since degenerated into brown, put a little backwards on the head, surmounts a round, unmeaning face, unless the cuuning twinking of a pair of very small gray eyes may redeem it from that charge The features are small, and Dutch, the hair gray, low on the temples, and thin; the cheeks somewhat wrinkled, but florid, und such as do not misbecome a lover of beer and claret; the cars are very large, dark-coloured, and protrude from beneath his hat, like two handles on the sides of a sneeker . His neck is short, and his shoulders high; but whether he is corpulent or bony, the ample folds of his tarnished brigadier's coat, which hangs on him in little less than the umplitude of a toga, effectually conceal His black stock is much too wide for him, and generally exhibiting such tokens of decay as are afforded by the sprouting out of a floss silk fringe, and the invasions of the horse-hair stiffeners, which stray beyond the boundaries prescribed by propriety, into the territories of the shirt-collar The colour of his coat variegates between scarlet and purple, accordingly as the weather and other enemies have directed their points of attack It is "in length magnificent," and its extremitica deploy dexterously over his horse's tail His trousers shun contact with his short boots, the tops of which cannot be displayed from any vanity regarding their ornate appearance, seeing that, for the greater part, they are eaten by ants and other marauders into a form yet unknown to ge-ometry The heel pieces are generally defunct, and the front quarters seem hastening to join their departed com Never by any chance, however, are his spurs forgotten, they are the only distinguishing characteristic of his rank as a field officer on which he appears to value himself, and as they glitter bright and burnished in the sun, one is apt to wonder by what unimaginable combina tion of human events, so chivalrous an ornament was appended to a person of the most unmilitary air that ever threw a shade over the warlike scarlet

Thus I Colonel Scowell, commanding the whole brigades and that collar and those cuffs, which the stranger, making them for black, regards as the insignia of the medical department, were, in their spring ude of existence, royal staff blue, time and much service bave given them this present soher "thue of eld".

One of those connexions which are marked in heraldry by the fatal bar-sinister, gave him claims on men in pow erful situations, which were realized by his being fixed during a great portion of his years of service, in one of those half civil, half trading sinecures, which render a man fit for any thing rather than for a soldier But years must bring additional rank, and that placed him above the pale of the necessary qualifications for his former appointment There was a long debate amongst the influential part of the general staff, relative to his ultimate disposal At length it was determined to send him to -pore, which being very remote, his errors and imbecility were the less likely to be brought to the notice of superior authority . A sealed press and a strong party in the ministry were his securities, if the force he commanded were badly disci plined, the periodical movements of corps would afford them opportunity of recovery in other stations, if individuals suffered from his prejudices, which were notorious, who was to hear their appeal, when the channel by which it was to be made was himself? Open mutiny was the last thing on earth to be expected, and in short, as Scovell must be provided for every objection became light when weighed against this overpowering necessity

And so he came to - pore, and remains there, a monument of the perversion of patronage, and a living record of the blindness, the folly, the culpable neglect of duty, in those who have permitted it.

Much has been said in support of the secret report system, and much has been said and written against it. the army" says a periodical writer, "it is a standing regnlation, that an inspecting general, and indeed that every lieutenant colonel commanding a regiment, shall make, periodically, confidential communications upon the merits. the habits, the degree of proficiency in his profession, the manner (good or bid) of performing his duty, and so forth, of every officer under him, it being considered es sential to the well being of the service that the personal character and conduct of every officer should be convey ed to head-quarters, and there understood Undoubtedly this system yests in officers commanding regiments and districts an enormous discretionary power-namely, that of whispering away the reputation of men who have nu means of defence against caprice or calumny, and who thus may be secretly ruined in the opinion of those on whom their fortune depends, without their guessing at the hidden cause of their exclusion from every mark of Tayour A heavy responsibility indeed rests upon the possessors of such tremendous means of mischief, and if detected in foul play, they will be ruined."

A man high in rank once and—"It requires a strong hand to pluck us, we are too well fledged." And so Colonel Scovell found it, his missiles, charged with secret de struction effected their aim, in more than one instance, with a success fatal to the worlin divent to despair, but still

Colonel Scoveil hved, and prospered

But all this was not sufficient to procure for him the extensive notoriety be enjoyed. There were indeed some who called these official loving kindnesses by the innealle ame of guilt, but these might have been committed by a man in the same position, who, in other respects, had the characteristics of an able officer, and he would never therefore have stood out from the mass, in the broad and marked attitude of Colonel Scovell. There required a singular combination of mental traits to render an individual at once the terror, the abhorrence, and the profound contempt, of all within the suberce of his influence. The latter feeling was unmingled in the bosom of those only who were far beyond the reach of his tender mercies

The lowest faculty of the magination is the invention of certain fictions which have a tendency to dignify the relater, and procure for him the wonder, at least, of his au dience. We call this power by various names, embellish ment—extravgance—vanity in one of its phases, according to St. Paul, the Cretans were a proverb for their attainment of the accomplishment, and amongst modern in stances, we may quote two, well known to fame—Baron Murchausen and Major Londpow

Whether Colonel Scovell by frequent repetition, had at length succeeded in forcing on his own mind a belief of the impossibilities with which he was accustomed to regale every audience he could collect around him, is a problem that has embarrassed many whom he has so favoured Generally it was supposed that, pleased originally with the offspring of his fancy, he had dwelt on its beauties until convinced of its real existence, an undoubted symptom, according to metaphysicians, of hallucination, or insamty, the characteristic of which is to confound realities with idealities From this peculiar feature of his mind, how ever, if the graver officers regard it with disgust, the voinger contrive to extract an inexhaustible fund of amusement Every report that exceeds the bounds of probability, is denominated " a Scoreff 'and " Colonel Scovell's tast furnishes the daily jest of the mess table Nor does his rank, nor all the terrors of his system of espionage entirely place him beyond the reach of that braver species of satire or ridicule, which is aimed at a present object, not a distant

Colonel Scotell is married, but, as his wife has the misfortune to be half English, he has been separated from her some years, and soothes the autumn of his days in the pure retirement of an Indian Zenanah To this state of donestic existence probably, may be traced the peculiar tone of his conversation. That multary skill is essential In an officer occupying a position so prominent as his is a fact too obvious to be demed, but even the absence of that qualification is less to be regretted, than that his manners should be pre-eminent only in grossness as his morals in From his convivial parties the young officer retires in disgust, be he as little scrupulous as he may, and the novice from England in indignation and abhorrence Happily for Indian society, license of conversation is now confined to an infinitely small proportion of the worn-out wearan of the many, and even there do not verture it the the presence of officers of a certain standing But that the commander of a large force should stand out conspicuous amongst his inferiors chiefly by the unequalled attroctites of his language—that his example should avail, beyond all power of precept, to lead astray the ignorant and inexperienced, is a fact no less appalling in itself, than reflective of shame on those superior authorities who connive at its existence Colonel Scorell possesses one grand source of power and influence His extravagance is limited by the industences of the table, beyond these his economy is as if dietated by a cadet's necessity; consequently, his wealth has accumulated beyond all ordinary calculations

How far the influence of the golden shower extends, is recorded both "in tale and history" Therefore the nurer the government, the more constantly will its vigilance be exerted to guard against the employment of any functionaries whose necessities may render them accessible to that corruption. The commanders in-chief of the indian armies are generally officers of his majesty's service, whose competence may be unquestionable as far as distinction in their profession can confer it, but their lives having been spent in spheres widely unlike that in which they are to play so responsible a part, it follows that their knowledge of the distinguishing peculiarities of that army whose welfare is in their hands, must be gathered from the officials who surround them If, therefore, one of these should be a necessitous spendthrift, whose wants compel him to accept the aid proffered by the astute, who regard him as the machine to work their wilk-if the profferer should be such a man as Colonel Scovell, whose chief mental pleasure is the gratification of private and personal malace,-is it miraculous that many honourable have been disgraced,many upright ruined,-in a land too where none dares exclaim in the vehemence of his honest indignation-"A curse on these unclean!"

If a voice so weak as the feeble one which is now essay, ing to be heard in free and just England, could hope to reach those will whom alone hes the power of redress for the future,—even if restation for the past be impossible,—its best energies should be spent in the prayer,—"Purify the covernment officer! I more the city which there remained to stalk abroad at noon-day!"

To his other annible qualities, Colonel Scovell adds an idolatrous veneration of the practices, the prejudices, the faith of the Hindoos. He thinks the abolition of Suttees an offence behows enough to basten the approach of the tenth Avatar,—if the Brahmins do not err in expecting it. In all points at issue between a pative and as European, in vaia is evidence given, in value fuels substantiated,—the case has been projudged, colour has decided, and sable carries the day against the field. But, by some curious constitution of mind, the partiality of Colonel Scovell, varying of course between greater and less degrees, ascend in proportion to the worthlessness of the object. Probably his axiom is the very benevolent one, that the greater the criminal the greater his chance of punishment, and the greater, by natural consequence, the charity of rescuing him. Once, when compelled by orders emanating from a higher source, to sanction the execution of a convicted murderer, he vinducated his reluctance, by awaying that, "although undoubtedly the man had been proved guily of the charge against him, his killing of the boy could scarcely be called marder, it being apparent that he in tended him only as a sacrifice to his God"

This partiality of Colonel Scovell's Is so notorious as to be by no means conducive to ' the preservation of good or der and military discipline" as the articles of war have it. Every smahl is aware that he has a certain advantage over his European officer by his power of making such secret statements to the general saib, as may suit his own private convenience, or gratify his revenge In defiance of all the regulations of the service, it is to be deplored that Colonel Scovell permits constant reports to be made to lum by na tive subordinates, of their immediate European superiors, and regards such reports as a ground of action Falling instantly into the views of the artful Hindoo, who is acute at detecting the mainspring of his feelings, he hesitates not to set the whole of his numng apparatus in action against the object of the secret accusar's enmity. The private report system works well in such cases, as many unfortunates have had reason to deplore The accused, neither called on to explain, nor permitted to defend, has the pleasure of finding himself the subject of censure, and sometimes of punishment, before he suspects that he has been guilty of the shadow even of a breach of regularity The accusing Hindoo, to whom the success of his secret complaint is well known, exults doubly at the humiliation of a feringhee, and his own officer, he spreads the tidings of his joy amongst his companions, and the effect of his ex ample needs no description Consequently, a regiment has no sooner entered another station, after four years at - pore, than a series of courts martial and punishpore, than a series of courts martial and punishments are found necessary, to subdue the spirit of multay which is roused by the first attempts at the enforcement of discipline. No words can express the annoyances and difficulties experienced by officers' under such circum stances; and if the executations, the scorn of hundreds, could have aroused one painful feeling to the unuantly breast of Colonel Scovell, that deep and protracted thunder would, long ere this, have caused him to reture from a service to which he is at once a scourge, and a disgrace.

15*

A RAMBLING ESSAY.

READER, have you ever been in India ?-No '-Then you have not the least idea what a jungle is And truly, for the experimental part of the affair, I hold that "ignorance is bliss" How for miles, yea, hundreds of miles, the fair face of the earth may be covered with brake and thicket, undignified by one stately tree! Before, behind, around us, spreads the tract of desolation, exhibiting a world of bushes, not often exceeding the stature of a man, and redolent of gales that bring fever and pestilence on their wings Sometimes there is an oasis in the desert—a few acres of cleared and cultivated land lying around a con gregation of twenty or thirty wretched huts, which, with a rude shed, distinguished from the rest by a very humble apology for a crimson flag, being the little sanctuary of their superstition, constitute a village There is a tope of tamarinds affording the shelter to the way farer so necessary in this chimate, or perchance a more luxuriant one of mangoes, the sickly breath of whose blossoms you inhale with fear and trembing And over and above all, you see the broad spreading leaves of the plantains, which are ad jacent to the dwelling of the potail-the little magistrate of the place, from whom, on arriving at your tent, you prohably find a tray of fruit awaiting your acceptaoce

But what ferthly is suffered here to recomm dormant! What powers of production are permitted to exhabit there energies in the propagation of rank weeds and useless (inhabited ground, repays the small toil expended on them I the will be will be profate to say in this case—if the harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few in

We advance some miles, and there are no traces of short brush wood in the stately jungle around us. We have passed through a narrow arenue, bounded on either side by a forest of bamboos, like a cathedral onset, with its thousand columns. The eye in vian seeks to penatrite the dark mass of forest through which our path hee, all its black and mysterious, an impersonation of death or etc. nity The imagination revels in horrors beyond human It has hidden adieu to every day life, and feels that it is touching upon the threshold of the tiger's lair, or hanly encroaching on the covert of the serpent Here are many concomitants of sublimity, the unknown, the gloomy, the terrible And anon, what a picturesque contrast! Our tent is pitched on the bank of a wide river, part of whose stream indeed has been parched by the fierce suns, but the channel of whose deeper waters still flows clear, cool, and refreshing How it sparkles in the intense light-golden and glittering as hope itself! And there are the Hindon girls laving their limbs in the stream, or like the princesses of Homer, washing their garments on its banks lending ammation to the picture! How gentle and delicious is the breeze that now fans the burning brow! What a repose the whole scene casts over the spirit! An epicutean might luxuriate in such a phase of mind, and a Brahminical philosopher might antedate the intellectual abstraction which he believes will be the attitude of the soul until it is finally absorbed in Infinite It is my birthday, and how my thoughts are wandering back into the past, diving into the future! How strong is the propensity of the mind to shape out things yet to come, and amongst all the wonders of that wonderful animal, man, perhaps there is no greater than that he, having no security beyond the present, should yet live so little for it. The retrospect of one single year must teach us how the developments of time mock all our predictions and presentiments,-and ten years-ah 1 ten years ago," I should have derided as the wildest of dreamers, him who had ventured to foretell that my foot should one day press the and plains of India, that I also should visit the scenes whence the Sultana Scheberazade gathered so much of the lore by which she earoed her life-and that I too should have sighed over the dissolving of the spell whose enchantments covered my youth with their glory Alas! India is no longer the fairy realm, whose gorgeous splendours visited my youthful visions It is a land of fer vent heat, and real suffering, which brings one's mind loto constant subjection to the ills of the body

We are still burned in this mass of jungle, but it is not all unlovely Ah, no —Where is the spot of the Creator's world which furnishes not some tint of the beautiful, or some form of the grand, or some trait of the sublime and terri ble ?-

The jungle gridles us, a mighty fence Shut mg our small encomponent from the world The stirring world beyond. Litters and plains. The stretch of ocean, or the baunts of men,

We do but think on as of pictures fair, Or glawing things that populate our dreams It were a place where the most world t red man Might piteli his habitation Once, perchance, Towards the wane of every fortieth moon, A rude irruption of some warlike hords Might teach him he had not unlearnt to bate: That men sull hved, and therefore, he had foes :-They pass, a shadow gliding o'er his days, "The gone-and all in fair Not does there want A volume of mysterious nature, apread
For his instruction and delight. Thousands Of plants with venom or with healing fraught. Of flowers dyed in the golden sunset—into That shock his plumes in Paradise. Here too Abound in sects innumerous; some 's the sun Gambol in glonous armour green and gold, And some by might shine out, the stars of earth How wondrous are the laws of this small people. The thousand commonwealths that live so near,-And hive at peace! But not without discussion. Methinks I hear in their so frequent buzz The warm debates of each Saint Stephen's chapel, An insect conclave

Now we are encamped on the summit of a gentle acclivity, with a river running along one of our flanks, and a broad plain stretching around About a mile in our rear there is a fortified town, and its gateways, with their Saxon looking arches, and the fort with its bustions and parapet, are distinctly visible. The servants who visit the village declare that that fortress contains a guard of a hundred Arabs, but they carefully conceal themselves from the eight of Europeans, for they are in the pay of his Highness the Nizam, who would fain hold his neighbours of the Company's dominion in ignorance of the extent of his means of offence and defence Our tent is under the shade of an immense banian tree, whose columnar branches are ranged so regularly that the eye regards them as the pillars of some vast hall The sky is sererely bright above us, but on the verge of the horizon the fills arc sull "cloud-capt," threatening us with a repetition of the perils of "lightning and tempest" from which we have so recently been dehvered It is a fearful thing to the way farer in this land to feel how various and multiplied are the poisons in which death may steep his arrows! How widely different are our views of things in sickness and in health! When the terror of death is opon us, when we look closely into the grave, whose brink our foot actually presses; when we watch the hour-glass, and think that the slow-oozing sand drops all too quickly, since, ere it is exhausted, we too probably shall have passed away; when we would gladly lay hold on Time, and shudder and faint beneath the overwhelming idea that, despite our efforts, he will but advance another pace, and we are plunged into eternity !-- ah! what then profits the gold and the gem? Here is the embroidered garment with its costly array, and there is the shroud, and we have no choice between, for a mightier than we has said, ' Take thou this !" And again, when we linger days-weeks-months, and this terror is still upon us, for the danger is not passed, and we feel that the cord by which we cling to life becomes daily more attenuatedah! this is the time, this is the place, when the hope of the Christian, precious as it is at all times and at all seasons. becomes dearer than all besides that is dearest! Then, indeed, we feel that ' the peace of God" is of price "far above rubies," that ais word is "better than gold, yea, than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb " The bravest man cannot resist the influence of this protracted fear, here, as in the grave, the spirits of the proud and the meek meet on equal ground Here wa feel that, measured against the omnipotence of God, the most vaunted strength of man is frailer than the reedfeebler than the breath of the infant-puny of stature and immature of growth-affording no power of resistance, helpless and hopeless as age or imbecility !

How awful is the soice of the storm along this unsafe shore! The guishing rain—the rolling thunder—the booming waves—the hourse surf—and the struggling wind, as if in passionate conflict with some restricting power—that tremendous orchestra of the elements, whose awful music seems to warn us of the might of God and the impotence of man, shall these too speak to the soul in vain? Here, where the seythe of the destroyer move down so many victims, where its edge is always nearly whetled and always blood stained, is it here that man, in his reckless desperation, regirds his Miker least? Is it true that this soil, so earth where he least remembers that he have is soil, and that the worth is infinite? Is it here alone, where our grasp of time is less tenacious, that we are least anxious to ore-

pare for eternity 7

Religion, must criested, hed any goost, broadening theorem when the human heart, by are thy visits in this land so rare? Failed from that fair the west it licid larme, to work estimate the branch healing on their wright, the control of the branch healing on their wright, the many thin the research and eath, Are we drift sleepers? Doth the voice within, they want of soften of remember of the six of the state of the sta

The household changes—the names we love— Parent and brother-father mother, friend Forget to I reaths one memory of HIM.

The more it an parent and the more than friend?

Fiernal Father—cverlanung home! Doth no ci ord vibrate to such sounds as these? Then let us tremble—tremble at ourselves, At all around-at death-at 1 me-at life All breathes despa r-for I fe how long soe er Must end at last, the Eat bath sone forth That TIMF shall be no more! And thou, though young, Healthy or happy atron" w th grant a atrength, Sinews of brass or iron year Thou must die!

Whence is it that these things, true and obvious as they always are, press so heavily on my spirit now? Surely it is not matter of melancholy that eternity succeeds to time, -that this "mortal shall put on immortal ty, and this cor ruptible shall put on incorruption" Yea, it is matter of rejoicing, but " with trembling" The world of spirits !- the veil of the shrine is to be torn away, and the innermost secrets of the sanctuary to be disclosed '-the though s of the heart revealed '-that heart "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked 17 It is a revelation to be apprehended

with awe

Poor Aimsworth is gone! There is sickness in the camp, and he has been one of its earliest victims. He was the gavest, the kindest, the bravest spirit amongst us-one around whom existence seemed to be throwing her bright est hopes-who scarcely extended his hand but to gather a flower He was the pride of many friends-the del ght of many hearts And all this non is as nothing Hasmote, before whom the "strong man boweth himself" and before the youth had time to say, ' God be merciful to me a sin ner ''-his sun was gone down "whilst it was yet day"

We halted yesterday, to deposite his remains in their final resting place I watched the funeral party as they stood under the shade of the tope where they had dug his obscure grave, in all the pride of their military array It was somewhat after day break, but the gray morning was rising in sad and gloomy hues There was mist on every hill, and the trees were dropping the heavy dews and all looked forlorn and melancholy, even as the occasion seemed to demand A pall of moorning concealed the brightness of nature and the human hearts yet instruct with life, trem bled painfully amidst the solemnity of the scene

The last military honours were paid to the pride of the regiment, the last look was given to his grave, and that day wore away heav ty There was no sound of much assuing from the tent where the officers held their mess, for the chair of the gay one was empty, and the first time we miss the accustomed face, and know that we shall look on it no more, hard as our hearts may be, then we feel that part of us is gone! But, alas! the impression is hardly durable enough to be salutary! These contingencies are of so frequent occurrence in this land, that even now are heard the voices of those who loved him, saying, "Where death is so common, were we to grize to long, our life would pass away in mourning? And the sun roce brightly this morning, and the band played cheerily, and all nature seemed redolent of joy, and the young men vaulted on their steeds, and rode proudly as of yore, and the name of Aimsworth ceased to be more than a memory amongst them!

We have arrived at a village, the inhabitants of which are chiefly Brahmins. We are encamped on a plain stretching downwards to a bright clear tank, rippling and sparkling In the breeze and sunshme. On the opposite bank lies tho village, shielded by topes of trees, close under the shadow of a hill that stretches its summit far into the sky. The pagoda, a large and radiantly white pile of buildings, stands on the summit: and now that the sun is full upon it the chunam is absolutely dazzhng. Already our people are making pilgrimages to the shrine of the idol, and senres of Brahmins are hovering round the outskirts of the camp. with their bare heads-some completely shaved, some with a single lock of hair remaining on the crown, tied and knotted in a bow. How picturesque an air do they give to the landscape, clad in their snow-white garments, with their drapery of salmon-coloured scarfs, thrown out in strong relief from the dark back-ground! And the day is so brilliant !-- all nature seems decked for the celebration of some high festival. And how nich her decorations !-There is on my table a vase, -no, let me not give it so imposing a name; no race forms a part of camp equipage; -a large tumbler of water, on which hes the most glorious of flowers, the Lorys. This is indeed a meet cradle in which the love god may float down the brightest of streams. Its leaves, softer than velvet, of a nure cream-colour .full, numerous, and large, stretching far beyond the circumference of the vessel :- in its centre is a netal like an inverted cone, of bright yellow, spotted, in regular ouincunx, with shining amber spots, palpably distinguishable from the groundwork Altogether it is the most magnificent flower that ever gladdened my eyes, for I dearly love flowers, and rich and varied are they in this orient land. Sight, however, is the only sense they delight, for the few that exhale any perfume, possess it too overpoweringly to be gratifying to an European. The wreaths of white flowers—mulice pooloo, or moogra ka phool—with which the native deck their guests at the celebration of their rule glous fistivals or marriage feasts, render the whole atmosphere most painfully oppressive. The rose only,—delectous cverywhere,—the delight of every chinate from "indus to the Pole,"—jields its breath of fragrance to the winds wooling, in that pure sweetness which was the delight of my jouth, and the only sweetness that nuade me forge that "the violets were gone."

In this place a very short time since, the rite of the Sut tee was celebrated with a frequency that rendered it par ticularly obnoxious to Europeans But an enlightened government ha, by one vigorous measure, prevented the future perpetration of this enormity 1 have inquired of many intelligent natives, whether they believe that the sac rifice is usually voluntary on the part of the victim and, averse as they are to left up the veil from their own super stition, which woos not-which cannot accept proselytes still their evasions are more than sufficiently explanators I have heard also from officers who have been present on these occasions, that the cries of the woman, at the last dread moment, when, bound down to the pile, she first begins to feel the prin of the scorching flames, were frequently audible far above the crashing of the native band which thundered on the ears, or the yells of the devotees that were prostrate around ladeed, instances of resist ance have been known, vain and hopeless as the attempt must be, when so many relatives were interested in preventing an escape that must cover them with infamy, and deprive the poor sufferer of all those ties and ' appliances of life," which make existence desirable. The dread of this horrible death, however, has occasionally been so intense as to overcome all other fears

—Hark I—the widow's wall—
How most unneed for world so fart a 'hill,
Thiff were a shark heesen ag Satan a hill,
Thiff were a shark heesen ag Satan a hill,
Thiff were a shark heesen ag Satan a hill,
Har ya nod wap nout "bo sata"—trothers—friends—
The whole o'slibeted ther use of war.
Har ya nod wap nout "bo satan" trothers—friends—
The whole o'slibeted ther use of buy how Mark again and with a popp of buly show
With a gas mysterous, and with ble-snags loud, Hallow, the satafice; and the and crowd
And her dark eyes he has to good to be ter
The couch of fames perpared for deep repose.
Glazed as that eye, and far d and could ar death,
The Satan are shown to be the term of the couch of fames perpared for deep repose.
Glazed as that eye, and far d and could ar death,
Pales, and her they us covered wat the deev

Of fear -of deathful anguish, mortal pain. Through every nerve -over berd avenng flesh .-Th' expected horror creeps, -one last wild look, Above -around -strength gathers from deenst. Shame -haired,-tiea dissolved -the loss of love. The brand of outcost, -poverty's deep curse, -All sink to nothinguess, the present death Absorbe all other a nee, she bounds -she flea-Breathless but swift she flies -she fl es for life -The blood hounds are upon her to Piess and child, American and friend, all rush upon her track, And with the a seed of our erstit one fear Outsirp the panting vie im On the earth
She falls, and with her palm she graspa its bosom,
As the babe clings to the fond mother's breast When some dark shadow so tres it He-her son Her first born,—her best loved —of whose young life Scarce fileen y are have waned —with cruel force I lot fight her the history and her looks to read If aught of h man still tel ngenag there Ah, no !- stern apperantion bath transform'd The boy into the youthful pelican The titlere is tone!—That clance both almost kill'd;—
She how her head, and in that trance of wo
The sacrifice is finish d.l. Loud and long Cymbal and tru up shrick forth thumphant sounds. And hornd low closes the accursed rate

It is surprising that in the nineteenth century, there are Englishmen to be found who condemn the chactment which abolishes this terrific rite, on the plea of non-interference with religious prejudices. They contend that the sacrifice is always voluntary, whilst they do not state the fact, that the re'us il of the victim is attended by penalties which She loses her rank,-deprived render existence a curse of her husband's inheritance, she is dependent on those who consider her life a shame and disgrace on them ,-she is denrived of her accustomed ornaments, those marks of splendour and distinction su valued by every Hindoo, for she must never more appear in jewelled array, she is comnelled to perform service offices -the whole tenar of her life, in short, is changed, even her food is restricted, and there are few who would purchase permission to exist at such a price

We have now fortunately got into the tract of the tapnal, and our long arrear of letters, and of those "refuges for the destitute"—n wapapers—is at hand. How very little metant marks the progress of human life, as we consider it in detail, and yet, contemplating the whole of its course, what striking events has it evolved! How distinct, also, is mun's existence as an individual, from his social condition as one of a people! With what distant interest we contemplate those giganite occurrences which affect the fate of fempires, and agitate nations! Their shadow scarcely darkens for an instant the sanctuary of our domestic hearth. It is a great sacrifice of self-shness to be a true patriot—an upright servant of the commonwealth. The difference between private and public life is a state three a pleasant ramble on the green bank of a placed and gently flowing river, and a voyage on a stormy and bound less occan, whose tempesticus waves and agitated swell.

16

seem every instant to threaten shipwreck and destruction How welcome are letters from home! Yet what a soul sickness prevents one from immediately reading their con tents! They may bring intelligence of sorrowful importsuch, perhaps, as our enfectied minds and bodies are all too weak to encounter Who are gone-who are left, in that distant hemisphere, from which so large an interval both of time and space divides us? What a deep thank fulness when the important sheet is read, and we find all we have to lament is our own protracted absence from those whose wishes are so fondly breathed for our return Every letter proves the mistaken notions which the gene rality of well-educated people continue to entertain relative to the splendours of India Pearls and lewels still glitter in their imaginations, despite of all that has been said or written And therefore parents are still anxious that their boys shall realize the bright vision, and appointments to India are still assiduously sought

So, forth he sends he child beloved, and twendes A Ariner's blossego on his youthout head. There amountly the partons, and a a ght of ford reliceince mourants the asynchronic poor. Through the bright write of ten fleeting pears. The looks with yee of hone, and an lest to it his, for time of that small aparechait wang do instinct, for the most of the distribution of the state of the state of the fleeting pears. The paid he amount of his with confident—ease—Some laturates perchases, to gratify

And love of viral deplay. The father hence Extracts foll convolution, and imparts

Some almost constitution of the state of the sta

It is pleasant indeed to feel one's self at the end of a long and toisome journey Fatigue and danger seem to heighten the enjoyment of present case and security Accommodations, truly, there are few, for in this little garrison, the dwelling houses are not sufficient for the small number of officials whose duty compels their residence here Zemindar of the district, however, has a small bungalow, a mile distant from the town, which he has lent to us for immediate shelter. And indeed this is all it affords stands in the midst of an immense enclosure, which elsewhere would be termed partly wilderness, partly forest, and partly garden in India, however, it is distinguished entirely by the latter appellation There are vast topes of mangoes-thickets of plantains-long, straight avenues bordered by orange, citron, lime, and pumple-nose trees; with here and there a grove of cocoa nuts and paimiratrees In one part are vines trained over a lattice work of bambaos, supported by pillars, and oleanders, jessamines, Persian roses, Indian shot, and the common flowers of the country, diversify the scene Of these, few exceed in richness the pomegranate bloscom, of a glowing scarlet. In the evening, the air is rich with the fragrance of jessamine, myrtles, and orange leaves, but with all this, the place has a wild, strange appearance It is so different from all one remembers of the lovely gardens of England, fragrant with mignonette, and carnation, and rose Here are no likes-ofthe-valley-no violets-those sweetest flowers, which teach bumility so attractively. No "meadows trim with daisies nied," invite the visits of the stroller Round about lies a thick jungle, uninviting to any but the herdsman and his flocks, who nick up a scanty subsistence from the stunted herbage There is a road cleared out for communication between our unaccustomed residence and the nearest European dwellings, which are distant more than a mile, and which the red sand of the soil in the dry season renders, if not impassable, at least so disagreeable, as to tempt us to very rare migrations from our nest.

There are beauties, however, about the neighbourhood, although we are not as fortunate as to be within sight of them. The magnificent Godarery passes beneath the brow of the hill on which the fort is stiated, flowing through its proad pathway to the sea! Beyond it, there are ranges of hills of the mest fantastic forms, and topes and jungle give a sylvan character to the whole 1 am afraid, however, that sufficing warps the mind sadly. The really procured to the property of the sufficient of the work of the

with mlasma, and every breath consequently is drawn with fear and trumbling The fatalism of the Hindoos enables them to regard all these dangers with inconceivable ana thy The extent of the influence this doctrine of necessity exercises over all their actions, is astonishing. To all your arguments of expediency or inexpediency they invariably reply-"Of what use" That which is to be, will be" I pointed out to an intelligent native, who reported the fact of a band of robbers being in the neighbourhood and the probability of their making an inroad into the town the impolicy of his keeping a large sum of money in his house, which, as usual, had not the security of a single lock. He shook his head with an expression half grave, half indif ferent, and said, "He never hal been robbed, he always had large sums of money in his possession. If the appoint ed hour were come flow could be avoid it? If he were to lose the money, what mattered the removing of it? He should not lose it less because he had deposited it elsewhere How could be guard against that which must be?" They oppose these opinions to every advice you may offer that runs counter to their prejudices The Brahmin costs will rarely in extremity voluntarily seek the aid of an Eng lish surgeon, and they will never submit to bleeding or am putation except on compulsion. If told that the adoption of certain remedies would assuredly relieve them they betake themselves to their usual refuge-necessits-and qui etly meet death ir the faith of that doctrine

If spoken to on the subject of his idolatry, an intelligent Hindoo will tiell you that he workings in reality button God, and that his images are but so many means of realized the Supreme Heing to the mud, an aid which is necessary to it from its difficulty in grasping abstract idess—that be does not prostrate himself before the image as an image, but because it is a medium by which he apprehends the invisible God. Similar arguatents are urged by the Homan Catholies in extension of their image-worship, and such must be resolved to by every rational agent who admits

this primary violation of the decalogue

After all resignation is our duty everywhere, and if a Christian need more arguments than are furnished by his own divine volume, to induce him to content and activity. I well remember the instructions of Saadi the Persian—

At the command of God over the earth. His minus or the so sh wind hath outspread. An emeratid carpet deck d * th var ous flowers, Whose infancy is cradied in her bosom. Upon the stately trees he shand beniga. A drappry of verifient fol are hangs. And, when the season calls, a "purghtly show."

Of white or bloomy hads. A lascous junce His providence diffuse an the case, and from the tomed seed sprayers cannot see the control of the control of the control of the control of the control take. The sun,—the moon,—filld there demand take to gree thee breat O man—He prateful, then, And as thy munisters perform Her work, And as thy munisters perform Her work.

PINDARRIE ANECDOTE.

At the time when the flying bands of the Pindarries hored over the Indian empire, spreading desolation and terror wherever they appeared,—when none could be secure that their next ravages would not scatter ruin around him,—it is surprising that many districts yet preserved a sense of security, or rather, perhaps, thit apathy to all evil that is not immediate, which so strongly characterizes the Hindoo people, led them to prefer the enjoyment of their usual habits and habitations, to the trouble of taking those precautionary measur's by which, in many cases, some lives at least methy have been savely.

The little fort of Shahpore stands in the midst of a wide plain, over which the eye ranges until a chain of distant hills limits the horizon. Over the surface, occasional topes of stately prilimira trees or of the broad spreading cocoa int, are aprinkled, the bed of a small rivulet also winds across its extent, the channel of which is dry, except in the ramy easion. At other times, it forms a ravine, which is used as a patting y more frequently than the bandy' road be cause it saves some ground, and every native prefers the shorter path, even if its ruggedness, cost him threefold the time necessary to accomplish his journey by the longer.

The natives dwell in a small pettah situated some hundred yards from the fort. In the opposite direction are the lines of the sipahis, a battaloin of whom is always stationed here. The houses of the officers generally stand on the glacis, the two or three exceptions consist of the commandant's house, and some public buildings within the walls.

At the period to which this luttle angedote refers, IT mours were abroad that a Pindranc band was hanging about the neighbourhood, consequently guards were down bled, and some of the more fearful or more prudent of the inhabitants removed themselves and their I mines from the petials to the protection of the fort Still there were many who held aloof, and indeed so long an interval elapsed unarked by any occurrence out of the ordinary routine, that the former reports began to be considered, even by the Furopean officers, as "idle tales"

It was one evening towards the full moon, the night had set in stormily, and the wind blew in those terrific gusts which generally attend the commencement of the monsoon The day had been one of comparative excitement, for a wayfarer from a neighbouring village had arrived in piteous plight, and told his story of robbery by two or three Pindarries, from whom he had escaped with life only because they were occupied with contending about the division of the booty The man sought reliige in the fort, for he asserted that the Pindarries were at hand, but h s example had not many followers, and his assertions were considered as the exaggerations of fear The adjutant indeed, directed a guard to be picketed, on the flank of the pettah and recommended them to keep a sharp look out. When this guard had taken their post, the rest of the garrison not on duty, turred in and slept fearlessly

Slight as this measure of precaution was, its result added much to the adjutant's reputation for vigilance, sagneity, and all those qualifications that proved his competency to the post he held. A little before midnight, a messenger from this advanced guard came to his quarters, and rous ing him, instantly reported that a large band of Pindarries were surely approaching, for though they could not yet be discerned, "the havildar had put his ear to the ground, and had dishinguished the far off tramp of many horses"

It happened that this havildar was a Hindoo, whose acute sense of hearing had served the army on previous occasions, and indeed had paved the way for his promo-The adjutant knew, therefore, that his authority on this matter was unquestionable, and he directed that the inhabitants of the pettah should be immediately directed to shelter themselves in the fort, whilst he went direct to the commandant to report the existing state of things, and receive instructions accordingly

The storm had ceased, and the full orbed moon shone out brightly and clearly over every object. The white clouds undulating through the heavens, reflected her brilhant light, and the adjutant was acute enough to know that the Pindarries, if indeed they were approaching were deprived of that sheltering obscurity in the expectation of which probably their plans had been matured. As he went along he roused the officers from their slumber, and nearly the whole of the digmtaries of the regiment were in seemly array, at his side, when he reached the dwelling of the colonel ascended the ramparts, and from the highest summit looked out to see if there were any appearance of the approaching danger As if the whole credit of this night's events were to fail to tie share of the adjutant, he was the first to dis cern a multitude of tiny figures, not larger than the puppets of the fantoccint at the distant point from which they were discernible Guided by his observation, the whole party were not slow in corroborating the fact by the evidence of their own senses, and a council of war being convened on the instant, it was carried unanimously that the whole military force, as well as the inhabitants, should enter the fort, lock the gates, man the walls, and "do great things at an advantage"

The whole party, with the commandant at their head,

The drum beat "to arms," and the spahis, already roused, speedily obeyed the call. They came in rapidly by tena and twenties, and proceeded to their various posts. The peaceable part of the inhabitants were quickly hastening to the fort, and the sentries at the gate were ready to close its heavy leaves when the last imperer should have passed. And there was little time for tardiness, or for reluctant looking back to the homes that were quitted, for the figures that had appeared at first so small, were now visible in their proper dimensions, and every man on the walls could see, that the party was well mounted, well armed, and numerous Aiready the colonel had directed his adjutant to give the necessary signal for the closing of the gate, when the attention of the latter was arrested by the sight of a female figure, carrying an infant in her arms, hastening forward with all the rapidity her burden permitted. The signal therefore was delayed for there was much interest in the scene, painful but excinng The Pindarries were evidently gaining ground, and the girt's steps were tottering as if she fainted beneath the exertion, and the heart of every spectator beat with fear for the result.

But there was one on whose brow large drops of agony were standing, for he knew that those two who were in such extreme jeopardy, were they around whom every affection of his soul would have thrown the mantle of his protection. It is Ummiab and her child in said a voice near the adjutant, and he saw the sipahi who had uttered the words, dart from his post. There was no time to recall him, even if there had been the inclination,-but the adjutant suspected the trnth, and the next moment the appearance of the man rushing from the gate, and bounding forward into the plain, confirmed that suspicion

The adjutant's whole soul now became interested in the matter He saw plainly enough that the individual was Appub who for his good conduct was already marked for promotion on the very first a canney after the supernumeraries should be absorbed. The man flew along with a speed that almost dazzled the eye, and he reached the objects of his anxiety just in time to catch his child from the arms of the fainting mother. With one hand he clasped it to his bosom, and with the other arm encritching his wife's waist, he retreated with all the speed such a burden would nermit.

The Pindarries neared the fort. In vain the commandant ordered the adjutant to give the signal, and declared that the lives of two mast be sacrificed to preserve the lives of many. The adjutant, if hard of nerve, was not hard of heart, and if he dad not refuse obedience, he delayed it. Meanwhile Appials toiled on and onwards, and he heard the heavier trampling of the horses' hooks, and he thought he felt their breath upon his neck. Gathering up his strength for the last desperate effort, for already the gate seemed turning on its hinges ready to shut out him and all he loved from hope and his—panting—breathless—his starting veins swelling almost to hursting—every object dancing before his eyes—he bounded once—twice—as a courser just commencing a race—and the third time he had nassed the gate!

An instant more and it had rolled heavily on its creaking binges, and the unaveidly machinery of its fastenings was adjusted—and the baffled spoilers who had been driven nearer to the fort than prudence warranted, in their eager hape of outstripping the so hardly rescued, fell thickly beneath the shots from the ramparts. They were too expected to the heavy fire to venture on the commission of those devastations which formed the principal feature of their predutory warfare, and very soon they were seen scattered in all directions, and flying across the blana, until finally they disappeared

Meanwhile Appals had relinquished his precious but do not he care of the many hands stretched out to aid him. The child, all unconscious of its danger or escape, moined in the midst of the strange faces and stranger noises around it. Unmath, the young mother, looked on the boy,—then on Appals, who had fallen prostrate in a state of utter exhaustion. They brought water, and she, finging herself by his side, put it to his lips, but, prired as they were, they received it not. She bathed his brow, and she looked into his open eye., but they were faced, and gave no sign of recognition. She felt his heart—tis pulse had ceased, his hims fell powerless from her touch. Monless he lay there, and some said it was a deep swoon.

"Sar Charlees Hamiltone, saib come command regiment, sar,—majesty's regiment—Colonel, sar, that gentleman,—old colonel dead more one year, sar Sar Charlees Hamiltone, saib come for new colonel"

This solved the problem It could be no other than my Sir Charles, and to make assurance doubly sure I des

natched a chit forthwith

With inconceivable satisfaction I contemplated the char acters of my own name traced on the except of the reply, for every line—every curve—bore decided testimony to the nenmanship of my friend I opined and read—

"I have been very few hours in the 'golden orient' but long enough to have thought of you, and to have made in quiries after you. I find an idle gentleman, on a visit of curiosity, so unaccustomed a guest in this world of the an ippodes, that everybody I have seem—pretty many for the time—is able to give me a mite of information. Fray come to me immediately, my people are bringing in my traps, but in an hour's time we shall be 'quiet and confidental' in my own suite.

"Your's as ever,
"Caarles Hamilton"

"CHARLES HAMILTON" The honey of Hyblea never was more welcome to parched lips, than these magne words to my soul I was hungering and thirsting for sympathy and confidence, and here was the promise of both in the richest abundance

Fithin the hour I found my hand warmly clasped in that of my friend. And when greetings had been interchang ed, and many questions alsowered not very "germain to the matter?" I have to communicate, he explained his mo tives to such a voyage

"I need not recount all my sufferings relative to Jane Markham—I beg her paridon the Dutchess of Down, you know all that affair, but imagine, in short, all the desidation a man can feel, and judge how eagerly one like me, not much troubled with nerves, would accept such a pretext for serking new seenes and strong excitement, as was afforded by the offered command of my own old dra goons. No—do not look commisseratingly, I am not an object of pity, now, I told you I came out to be cured—and the remedy?"

But passe pour cela. For the love of the dear sex, for whom all disappointed swains ought, at the lesst, to die of tender melancholy, I shall not disclose more of my friend a feth-d fift at this present moment.

I had an engagement to an evening dinner at the house of Mrs Burkhill, the wife of one of the members of council I helieve'l ought to have said, at "the house of the honourable Mr Burkhill," but, as nobody does say so, I am contented to err with the multitude

I paid greater attention than usual to the adornment of my outward man, for the party was to consist of the very like of the presidency, and many of the new arrivals it is not enquette for the governor to dime with any less dignified personage,—the kmg may thus honour a subject, but a governor of Madras is a widely different person Consequently, Sir Charles Hamilton was obliged to devote the first evening to his distinguished host, and Mrs Burk-hills party was a star minus

There is one trait of civilization that deserves all the commemoration my pen can bestow on it, after the ladies retire from table, at the majority of Indian duners, the sederunt of the other sex is of short duration the sederant of the other sex is of short duration.

I had searcely seated my-elf in the drawing room after the repast, on a couch placed in a remote situation, such as I lioped would secure me from being the object of the observations I meditated on others, when the persevering eye of Mrs Burkhill penetrated the shade of my retirement, and she forthwith followed the direction of the optical ray.

"Now what do you think of her?" she began in a breathless anxiety of azitation "Ah! I see you are perfectly horror struck? Is it not really pittable ??

"My dear Madam, excuse my stupidity, but I must be indebted to your explanation"

"You sat oext her at table! My niece Sarab—Sarab Evans—the tall brunette at your left. Is she not perfectly bornd?"

"Horrid!—Love forbid that ever I should be graceless enough to apply that horrid term to any of your bewitching.

sex And the lady in question-"

"Ah, you are so kind! But what on earth shall I do with that petit nex retrouses? Then her complexing? I do not like English or even Spanish brunettes in this country, stupid people will take then for half-castes! And Sarah's carnation-colour, which is pretty enough now, will soom fade here, you know. And her eyes—large black eyes are so common! One's butler—one's ayah, every wright on the establishment has eyes ten fold darker and brighter?

"But the expression—the intellectual—" I began
"Oh, no" she exclaimed "There has been quite a committee of survey on her this morning, and we all agreed monds are really positive that she is terribly had fon , and In fact I am ashamed to trouble you with such a discus sion, but you are so moch Pami de la maison, and we all have so high an opinion of you, that I do not hesitate to call your attention to Sarah's manners, her flippancy to our excellent friend Mr Willoughby this morning has, to say the truth, almost broken my heart' For poor dear Willoughby, you know-"

"Is the happy bridegroom you have selected for your mece," said I, supplying the pause which her half embarrassment occasioned

"Between ourselves, exactly so I should not like it to go farther, but everybody is so confident of your discretion! And Willoughby is so well off-four thousand ru pees a month, at the least, and he was so anxious for the alliance that I am almost tempted to believe he would have overlooked the hornble nex retrousee, but her manners !so glaringly offensive! would you believe it, she absolutely laughed at him, and he so truly respectable" But after all, there was nothing very criminal in a laugh Mr Willoughby might find in his heart to forgive it, especially as I observed the young lady exhibited a very pretty dimple on those occasions," said I extenuatingly "But, my dear sir, it was a most particularly impertment laugh, and as poor Willoughby, there is no denying the fact, is certainly a plain, billous looking, hepatic panent.

it made the thing very pointed, and he looked actually fierce, I assure you" "Perhaps she might, ofter all, have started objections to Mr Willoughby" "What can you be dreaming of? Why, he has four thousand a month now-a place at the council shortly-and with his immense influence and interest at home, there is every probability of his socceeding our present excellent friend, as governor m

"But, my dear madam, young ladies are upt to view things less discreetly, and to dream of youth, and love in a cottage "

"You are jesting! What bas a girl to do with love, who comes out to India? Common sense must tell her that she Is here to improve her condition, which will be best effected by securing the most advantageous parts that falls in her way 11

There was no resisting an inference so purely logical I had nothing to do but to buw assent.

"Do you see that very pretty girl opposite?" continued my hostess "Miss Cleveland, come out to her sister Mrs. Brooke Willoughby seemed quite enchanted with her at dinner to day, and really it would be too provoking, after all my anticipations, ta see Mrs Brooke's sister, Afra Hilloughby !- I should expire with vexation! Who besides Sarah ever could have dase so unadvised a thing as to bring a nez retrousse to Indla ?"

All my recollections of Chesterfield were insufficient to check the action of my risible muscles "Excuse me," said I, "man is a laughing animal"

"I forgive you, nevertheless, I am distressed That young man talking now to Burkhill, his name is Montre-sor, a young civilian, a ship-mate of Sarah's, I overheard him giving such an account of her conduct on board! so haughty, so disagreeable, so avreastle Colonel Sir Charles Hamilton, of the --- dragoons, came out with them, and Montresor says that, for the last fortught, he avoided any but the most distant intercourse with the perverse girl, so much was he disgusted with her manners. Women ought never to be satirical, it is our wisest plan to attract your sex, and a witty woman is, of all animals, the most repellent. But the whole room are wondering at our tête-d tête. let me introduce you to Sarah, and do see what you can make of her"

I obeyed, and crossed the room to a couch on which the unfortunate proprietor of the nez retrousse was sitting in solitude, evidently in the full enjoyment of that delightful sensation—feeling alone in a crowd

She almost started as my hostess mentioned my name and her own She received my introduction with a negligent, but not ungraceful acknowledgment, and Mrs Burkhill, with a sigh and a shrue, retreated

I shall not record my first conversation with Sarah Evans. I shall make use of my notes from that point where I find the approach of Miss Cleveland added a third to our party.

from which moment my role was chiefly that of listener "What a delightful party I is it not?" the pretty little lady began "I do so hke India! Are not you happy to be here, now?'

The now was emphatic, as if some former regret of England had been expressed

"I dare say you like it, it must be like a visiting party in the holidays to you just from school " replied Sarah good temperedly "But I never was at school, you know" "That is so odd! I thought all girls went to school, or had governesses, or something"

"Yes, I had something," said Sarah, and then I saw the "laughing devil in her eye," which had disconcerted poor Mr Willoughby "I had so uncle, and a spelling book and a primer, and things "

.....

"Well, but really, can you not play, or draw?"

"Do you not remember that I have told you I have no ear? But, perhaps, you are interested in making assurance doubly sure I assure you, you may ask me to pay with the greatest safety, for I actually do not-know the gamut, and, as I never true to paint a flower in my life, you can request a sight of my portfolio with just as much impunity Landscapes and huge heads in erayons are not in fashion here, I imagine, so that I am altogether the person in the world to act foul to your brilliant."

"How very odd -mais vous parlez le l'rançois?"

"I understand your question, but I have never been in France, and have a bad accent, therefore I never speak it." " He used, at school, to speak it every day in the week but one,—so I carght to speak it very well Do you know, Mr Willoughby eays, be thinks it dutie essential to along to speak French well? He is a very nice man, that Mr Willoughby, though he is rather plain. But them my siste tells me he has four thousand rupees a month, and he is so agreeable, you can't think. P

"Indeed I can A man must be very delightful with four thousand rupees a month '-Wby, if he were a gentleman with a pig's face, it would invest him with all the qualities that could captivate woman" !

The little beauty looked puzzled
"Well, as Montresor used to say on board, there is no such thing as understanding you"

"With his understanding he meant, I presume?"

"But he is a very nice young man, only a hitle talkstive and conceited..."

"And impertment and overbearing, whenever he dares no forgiven his teling Sur Charles Hamilton that you said you 'did not value him for his rank, and that you judged him as you would a subattern—no, a dezu-soide, it was I do not think Sir Charles much liked it."

"But do you imagine Sir Charles would be flattered by believing that all the attention he received was paid to his rank? Now, you know, he was quite sure that my civility was a tribute to his personal qualities."

was a thoute to his personal qualities."
"But he is not handsome ?"
"I did not mean that exactly," replied Sarah, and she blushed so becomingly, that I felt her wellt nex refrousse to be the most pardonable deformity in the world

"I remember what trouble Sir Charles had to make you tall to him at far." You want to have talk to him at first You were always in your cabin!" Sarah blushed again, and was silent

"Then afterwards you became friends," resumed the talkative little personage, "and two or three times you walked with him on deck in the evening And I remember one beautiful moonlight night, you were leaning together over the tafferel, and the steward came twice to tell you he wanted to put the lights out—

"Yes, yes, I remember," and Sarah blushed an Intense glowing blush, like the setting beam of an autumnal sun.

"You are quite a chronicle"

"Because it was so extremely odd that you never once walked with Sir Charles after that evening, and you used to colour so, when he asked you to take wine at table, that I am sure you had quarrelled Do you know, I think it was rery kind of him to ask you to take wine at all, afterwards! Montresor never did. Scarcely anybody used but the captain and Sir Charles, now I think of it."

"True, and if you recollect, my heart was quite breaking about it "

"Ah, well' you should have taken my advice, and have chatted with them all You seemed to think of nothing but England As you like it so much, why did you leave it?" 'My dear Miss Cleaveland.—I blush to tell you.—like

'obedient Yamen,' I did as I was bi !"

"Ah, there is Mr Willoughby walking by himself!—He looks duite melancholy—I will go and amuse him"

"Very benevolent of you, my dear Always feed the hungry And let me whisper to you.—I sincerely recom mend your taking Mr Willoughby without any fear of my heart's breaking '

The lady looked to see if there lurked any mischief in the speaking eye of her counsellor, apparently she was satisfied with the survey, for she gave a nod of approbation, and immediately joined the fortunate possessor of charms so resistless as four thousand rupees a month

The next time I saw Sarah Evans, was at a ball given by the governor I had made two or three morning calls in the interval but as Mrs. Burkhill was not visible, of course her protegee was not. And I fancy that the "potcrang" lady was anxious that the first public appearance of the petit nex retrousse should not take place on an occasion less splendid.

I had scarcely paid "bonour where bonour was due,' and exchanged a whisper with Sir Charles, when Mrs Burkhill seized my arm, and led me a little apart from the crowd that was looking fishionably dense in the centre

I have left Sarah to Mr Burkhill," she began 'l am really ashamed — Believe me, I have spared no persuasion, no entretty, to induce her to make an appearance rather more besitting the occasion Do lock at her and then turn an eye to the beautiful dress and lovely ornaments Miss Cleaveland wears - I have offered her a choice of new gowns,-the best of my own jewels,-but she is in flexible You see, nothing but her car rings are of any value,-diamond, but dreadfully unfashionable in their form ,-and to that slender chain she wears a hair presery er suspended, set in brilliants of the finest water, who was the donor, and whose is the hair, is a mystery -But you see, she will not even show that And then she is so sarcastic -She told me she was jewel enough in herself, if the peo ple had the sense to find it out, and she made it a point never to exhibit an escutcheou of pretence -To tell you the truth, before her arrival, it had been absolutely settled between us and Willoughby that he should marry her But she has quizzed him so unmercifully, that he told me this morning explicitly, she was quite too much for his management, and that his promise was of course conditional,—that the lady should be such as other ladies, and not a nondescript of this kind. Two hours after, I had a note from Mrs Brooke informing me, as her most intimate friend, of the approaching marriage of her sister and Mr.

Willoughby !- There!" Poor Mrs Burkhill's breath failed her at this chmax She fanned herself violently, and the thermometer in her vicinity must have risen considerably

"After all, what am I to do with this petit nez retrousse?" she asked plaintively "I can scarcely believe that even a subaltern will venture on her, for somebody has found out that she reads politics, and is, in fact, as blue as Madame de Stael There are such lots of girls coming out now a days !- See-they have formed quadrilles, and not a soul has asked her to dance -A dowdy in a mushn frock and a satin slip '-That is Sir Charles Hamilton,-the finelooking man with the governor-they tell me He has called, but I could not receive him, and like the rest, he is disgusted with Sarah, he has not even exchanged a how with her, for I have been watching him all night.—There is Miss Cleaveland with Willoughby What attention everybody pays her . They have an eye to his future parties!—See, she is absolutely leading off the quadrille! And Mrs Brooke is looking so bideously delighted!—Oh, I am just ready to expire with vexation -A plain muslin gown indeed in

I do not know how long the lady would have carried on this monologue, if her attention had not been attracted by the movements of the governor and Sir Charles, who were walking towards the place occupied by the nex retrouse ow as the said nez retrouse was quite alone, Mr. Burkhill having guitted her side for an instant, it was obvious that their intention could be nothing but to address the fortorn Sarah

Mrs Burkhill herself did not watch the proceedings of the group with greater interest than I did. My attention was however principally directed to Sarah; and I saw the colour heighten, and the eye become darker and brighter. as they advanced They-the dignitaries-stood before her some minutes, and, as the conversation proceeded, her embarrassment diminished At last she rose, and her arm was drawn through Sir Charles's with an air of great empressement. The governor smiled and retreated, and the pair approached me and my companion, who was absolutely panting with pleasurable emotion

After the usual chit chat which succeeds an introduction. -that ceremony was performed awkwardly enough by Sarah, by the way,-Sir Charles said, somewhat abruptly,

I thought

"Miss Evans is tired of India already, Mrs Burkhill" "Oh, she will like it better in time. Sir Charles ted home at first.15 "Well but I am tired too, Mrs. Burkhill -And in short.

with your permission, wa wish to go back again together" But why proceed ?- In a month from that evening of Mrs Burkhill's triumph, I was present at the wedding

breakfast of Sir Charles, and henceforward the petit nez

retroussé belonged to Lady Hamilton

Sir Charles had found complete cure of old love in a new The object of his voyage had been perfectly attained, and India to him therefore was only a place of exile. On the 22d of last January, Sir Charles and Lady Hamilton denarted on the deck of H M frigate the Thetis, for those happier shores to which the heart of the exile so longingly follows them.

A VOUNG LADY'S LETTER HOME.

"AT length, my dearest Lucy, you will actually hear from your still faithful and affectionate friend, that she has reached India in safety, and has been two months in this scene of gayety, and indeed carried about in a whirlings of pleasure If I had you with me to share my feelings and my conquests-for I assure you even these are not wanting-you who so well understand me, I should not have a wish ungratified This is certainly the most delightful place in the whole world, though the old residents tell me I shall suffer more from the heat next season, as new arrivals bring a stock of strength which enables them to resist it the first year To be sure, I must say, the women are sad frights, very yellow, and mostly so lean! However, there is nothing like use, for I find this leanness quite the ton If there were here 'a holder of the gurdle of fine forms,' he, if he had been twenty years in India, would assign the palm of beauty to her whose waist approached most nearly to the size of the centre of an hour glass Between ourselves, my dear Loo, it is not precisely the su-preme bon ton that regulates people here, though I should nut like to whisper this in society, for all one's little remarks arc, I find, repeated and exaggerated a thousand ways, so that I have already learned to be very cautious

I cannot pretend to give you any regular account of my feelings on landing, so much hurry, confusion, and excitement marked every moment. The bare idea that I was actually

In that land which for away Into the golden onent hea,'

awakened all my romance, and all my remembrances of Lalla Ronkh You know, however, I am not given to be poetical, and more common place realities very soon gained entire possession of my mind No, they were not comlow-place realities, the whole world seemed to have put on a different garb, the earth itself was no longer the same, but looked quite as foreign as the natives. The houses—the gardens—all partook of novely, ond nothing recalled England to me from similarity, until I found myself welcomed by my kind and fashionable aunt.

"There ore hosts of servants, but, entre nous, they seem to be very much in each other's way, not that one could manage with o less number, but there are so few offices which a single domestic can, from his caste, or some other absurdity, perform, that none have a tithe part of occupa tion sufficient for the doy They lotter about the verandahs, and when they are wanted, the person requiring them calls, 'boy !' or 'quilu"-a great annoyonce to me at first, whose voice, you know, is not quite that of Stentor, and I longed exceedingly for the silver call with which in days of enivalry, the lody summoned her maidens summons is generally obeyed by two or three popping in their heads through as many different doors, and the service demanded is probably performed in about quadruple the time which I, as a novice, thought reasonable However, when complaint is useless, patience is a preferable alternative to warrying, and where all the class commit exactly the some enormities, 'What is the use,' inquires my sensible aunt, 'of changing?'

"I have an sysh, intended as a substitute for one's own maid at home, and such a substitute! She is well enough for washing and cleaning the half, but as for dressing it, heaven keep my auburn, locks from her remoratess hands! As to arranging one's finery it is ceposited in drawers or the almirale certainly, but unless one's blonds, and chantilites, and ruffles, and furbelows and, abore oil, the sleeves, are to be crampice beyond all possibility of restoration, it would be better to keep them out of her dusky touch. In short, my dear, 'up to this present time of writing,' an ayoh is very well as a kind of housemaid, but for ony time in the shape of lady's-madism, I find her utterly useless, and if you eyer set foot on these eastern shores, profit by the knowledge which I have acquired from dire experience

"Do you know I find punkais, although indispensable in this climate, one of the misor miseries of human life. Beneath their influence, not a single curl remons in its place, but is wasted about by every gale in the most disagrecable manner you can conceive. This, you will allow, is an evil, but pronounce it not one of the first imagnitude, until you have taken into consideration all the circumstances attendant on a dinner party at the presidency. The first thing that anazes you is, the becatombs with which the table is covered. He must, Indeed, be 'a man given to appetite ' who retains the least mehnation to devour, after the display made on the uncovering of the dishes Soup-fish -sirloins and rounds of beef-saddles of mutton-ham and turkey, the everlasting delight of Indian enicures-fowls of all kinds-stews-curries-all steam at once under one's nostrils, until human nature is reduced to the last gasp Imagine the barbarism of no division of courses-no 'well graduated succession softening the transition between soup and sweetments,' as our friend --- would say -from eggs to apples, what a flight? Imagine, in addition to the steaming table, that each guest has one or two per sonal servants attending him, so that the table is actually defended as if by a double line of fleshly substances, from the approach of any 'gale from heaven,' if, perchance, such should be abroad Altogether, I must confess, the first trial of this nature to which I was exposed, was too much for me Whether my offactories are particularly sen sitive, or whether it was some memory of the sufferings of a passage through the Bay of Biscay, that recalled to my imagination all the horrors of sea sickness, I know not I began, however, to feel a loathing and heaving of the stomach-a dizziness in the head-a buzzing and whizzing in the ears, until even the awful sounds,- shall SEND YOU A GLASS OF BEER ?'-ceased to reach my senses,and down I was conscious of sinking-down-down-but nothing more do I remember. My aunt told me aller wards that nothing could have told better than this little emproviso as she called it The ladies present, indeed had reclaimed and declaimed on- fine lady airs !showing off Europe graces !- vastly delicate, indeed !really be afraid to invite Miss Warren "-pity the climate should be found so utterly insupportable at the commencement of her Indian career? But the male part of the as sembly commented on the demonstrative proof which had been afforded, that I was at least guiltless of wearing rouge, a topic which it appears, had afforded matter for much discussion My aunt predicted great success to me from this event, and indeed, vanity apart, I have no rea son to accuse her of uttering false predictions

"The drama—oh, the drama—I is truly delightful Not for the scorery—the dresses and decorations," as the play bills say—not for any professional excellences exactl—but because here the actors are all anateurs—people, whom one is accustomed to meet every day, and whose private feelings one can guess privil accurately when the control of the pronounce, produces. Testing the sound of the product o to hear some flaming declaration of love made by a very fine fellow in the course of his representation, whilst a hightning-look, perceptible perhaps to you alone, brings it home to your henri that you are the real heroine to whom it is addressed. However, in the regular course of things, I am not quite come to that part of my letter yet —so 're-regark a na vanisma'.

"As the sixth month since our sad, and parting has commenced, I hope you have not forgotten to despatch the stipulated supply of new fashions. You have no idea how very important a matter a new dress is in the circles here. I cannot enumerate how frequently the loan of every article of my beautiful French finery has been solicited by my kind aunt's very dear friends Of course, I did not hesttate to confer this little obligation, for I thought it a matter of course that my aunt would not only approve, but appland, my showing to her own friends any slight attention of this nature I was, therefore, very much surprised when she manifested great displeasure at my taking such a step without consulting her 'I could have told you exactly, ahe said, 'who could not be denied, and who could You see you have lost the opportunity of obliging those whom it was worth your while to oblige, for who will thank you, do you imaguie, for being clad in precisely the same costume as Mrs A and Mrs B and fifty other no-bodies are exhibiting? My dear child, you know nothing about these things, and you will find half the people making such perfect caricatures of your dressea, that you will never again choose to appear in them, and their sight to me will be detestable. Never lend a dress to those who are likely to look as well in it as yourself, for that is to create rivals .and never lend one to those who look ill in every thing, for that is to force upon the minds of your admirers disagreeable associations whenever they look on you No-no, in this country hold it as an invariable rule, never to lend a single garment which you think worthy of your own wear.

unless you know your parts thoroughly "
"I was very nuch mortified, I confess, and I received my aunt's reproof and advice in silence. To be sure, Lucy, on reconsidering the subject, I rather incline to consider her in the right, and I wish I had sought her advice before

I committed the folly However, a Parentr

"You know very well, my dear Loo, that women are libelled all over the world as scandal mongers Some impertnents of the other sex have pronounced it to be completely a female occupation. I wish auch accusers would visit this eastern world, and hear who are the purreyors to this appetite. Why, my Lucy, very 'man-creature that approaches you, endeavours to ingratiate himself by relating some anecdote to the disadvantage of the person with whom you shared the yesterday's dinner, or ball, or more probably who was the hostess on the occasion. It is really terrible to hear how pitilessly characters are talked away, just as if they were good for nothing Now to tell you my secret feelings, which I have not, I assure you, laid open to my aunt, for she, kind and good as she is, can never be to me the friend that you are, my dearest Lucy-to tell you then, my real feelings, I am absolutely afraid of furnishing in my turn matter for their satirical animadversions Is it not certain, that if they judge it acceptable to Miss Warren, to be told of Miss Beaumont's gauchenes, they will think it quite as acceptable to Miss Beaumont to be horrified by an account of Miss Warren's flirtations? In short, from idleness, and the limited range of topics this society affords to people who cannot think, it seems as if all the world looked at each other for the express purpose of talking over their blemishes on some future occasion

However, my dear Loo, as my packet has already increased to a most alarming magnitude, it is time I resumed the subject of the drama, relative to which I have hinted to you anmewhere in the course of this lengthy letter, that I had to communicate a- Cannot you, Lucy, who were always so good at guessing, divine what I have to tell? Yes, very well, I see you have guessed right, and to come quickly to the matter of fact, the hero of the sock and bus kin'-the darling of both Muses-the cynosure of all eyes is in sooth, Lucy, my hero too Ah, my dear! in India, as elsewhere, 'the course of true love never did run smooth!' I do think Captain Plantagenet-is it not a name for a hero?-is a man whose person would satisfy even your fastidious tast. I need not tell you the colour either of his eyes or his hair, especially as you know we always disagree on this point. But the fout ensemble is really irresistthle! And then the graces of his style and manner! Oh, my dear, if ever I am reconciled to the thought of the thousands of miles that separate us, it is when I feel that you would infallibly love him as well as I, and how could he, with his exquisite sensibility to what is best and most beautiful, avoid giving you a preference which even I must acknowledge to be due to you, although in this instance it would break my heart 7

"Well, my dearest Lucy, you are to understand that Plantigenet is Capitaln Plantagenet and nothing in the world besides, that is, he has no fortune, and, as my aunit urges, no interest. But then my aunit—or rather my underhas, which would be quite the same, that is, if a certain event should take place. Indeed I must own that I represented as much when my aunt continued to press these objections on me, but she was ready with a reply. She said that no interest could much small an officer of the known reader principles of Capitain Plantagenet, who had rendered himself so particularly obnoxinus to all those men in office whose influence must be exerted in his bebalf, that in a word, my uncle had no expectation or inchanton that I should marry a military man, and that the sooner I dismissed Capitain Plantagenet from my thoughts the better.

"Of course, this declaration very materially assisted in confirming my sentiments In his favour, if they had previously been wavering Moreover, my aunt's allusion to Plantagenet's principles was particularly unfortunate to ter cause, for I most admire him for the manly freedom of thought, which disdains to shackle itself in the fetters im posed by the tacit, but implied, despotism of this most arbitrary colony. The affair stands thus, An event occurred which occasioned much discussion in every circle, because it affected the interests of a well known individual. Plan tagenet, who is very literary, was desirous of inserting a letter in the public journals, which was suppressed by the censor of the press Of course his English spirit was very indignant, and he wrote an immense deal of angry blank verse i have inserted several specimens in my album, which I am in an ecstacy at being able to transcribe for you, as they will show you something of his character -You must understand that they are only fragments

*Land of the shret! where all meahod are shrest
Where he who star would three, must learn to crouch
And west the smooth, wolf are of Aria a sons!
The rad mis golders of the avoid bew
And eye day ne, where she, steen she Shat how he heed magnetis, and be commoditied to the shear of the shear

Evils these are, no doubt, but not the worst; Let's were intered with all the rulk; I et tyranny oppress with all his rage; These might be borns if beauting d d not bring. The place-spot on the and. It learns to crouch—To call that good which it must need endure,

Penounce is fetter clank harmonous. And kis the nauter's hand? The leptory Of service four cleaves so man thence for stell Bonn from, he leaves at long the best airror, the leaves are supported by a line, of the leaves of the leaves at leaves to be a line, of the leaves at leaves to be a line, of the leaves at leaves to the leaves the leavest the leaves the leavest the leaves the leavest the leaves the leaves Panders to superstition? and to foul Idolater, not bloodless? Ye who sell Indulgences for crime, and therewith feed Your appetite insultable of gold I le righteous rulers of ten my riad souls! Ye who to right prefer expedient. And deem it better that this eastern thme Should be the prison of the b got thrall, Than that by quaffing at the heavenly fount Of knowledge, they should learn that they are men, Men as unmortal, but not free, as ye.

Slaves in their mother land, from whose nich vens
Is de drun a godden drau.ht! Thankless ingrates, Who draw so largely and will nothing got,
Ye who bare weath meet for the sona of men, Aris-ec ence—the appliances of I fe-Give there—a neher boon than gems of gold— One the service room that gens of four And haid your empre up within their hearts, Or dare to lose it notify, better lost Than basely kept-a tribute-gratherer's prey! Palter not on the plea that, 'from your sony Their riches; birth re, ht thus will be despoil'd ! The future claims your foresight, and to give Un nutred to your heirs, what ye received, Is a main duty! Do ye that ye owe The age in which we live This hath existence. Hath form and substance hath an awful voice. And its requirements are most absolute. Cater not for a future thousand years, One century of which may never be l To possible posipone not certain Hear The rry that hath gone forth to uttermost earth, 'Tea' is us to be what ye are, then erect In nut das body, bleat with aris like yours, And knowledge, the best digan es of life!

But ye asani even a Buton's right, The right inherited with his first breath, Tit think as man—thus ilunking so to act—To fix the atigma of the poblic vorce Upon oppression, whether it be dealt. By your inmed ale and most pure and active, Or the great little, your executives?—

"Do not imagine, for an instant, my dear Loo that there efficients of indeposition ever issued from the press of this presidency. I assure you no such exertion of free-will would be nermitted. But copies were given to friends, and the manuscrint was circulated, and poor Plantagenet became a marked man, as my aut says, and as I feel; for, to confess the truth, I like him ten thousand times the better on this account

"But, however, there is another pebble thrown into the waters, which ruffles the course of my 'stream of love.' There is an odious 'honourable Mr. Denison,' a member of council, and of course a very old civilian, who has thought proper to bow before the beaux yeux of your friend, Oh, my dear, the man is such an unimul! such a ponderous, unwieldy manner of saying the merest trilles—making love like an elephant whiring through a waltz! If I were otherwise to forswear matrimony forever, I would never have this mao, were his estate to contain nil the diamondmines of India! And he looks at poor Plantagenet with an eye sparkling with all the benevolent emotions of 'envy. hatred, and malice; and, between ourselves, I have a shrewd suspicion that he and my aunt, who is his close ally, are manaurring together to get Plantagenet ordered from the presidency, before the expiration of his leave. You, in the bliss of English ignnrance, may lift up your eyes and doubt the possibility of such a proceeding, but I assure you, 'such things are,' and Plantagenet has related to me twenty occurrences of a similar nature. Hinwiver, they had better not drive me to extremity; for if they do, they will find me perfectly aware of my right to freedom of ac-tion, and, which is more, absolutely resolved never to be the honourable Mrs. Denison, with all the appurtenances of that enviable position, precedence, equipage, dress, house, and furniture, the grand delights of Indian existence.

"How I do wish I could have your advice, my dearest Lucy! You always understood me so well, and would so completely enter into my feelings. That you would pronounce Plantagenet a man every way worthy of the heart of woman, I am well convinced; and knowing this, it is almost useless to put the question, "that do you advise?"
And then the immeasurable time that must clause before I could receive the welcome assurance of your approbation. might bring so many unforeseen things to pass, as would increase my aunt's means of enforcing our separation, You will not believe that I have any doubts of my lover's constancy, or of the endurance of my own attachment; nor will you think it probable that a protracted residence here will change my tastes from Eoglish to Indian However, my de rest friend, it is better not to subject ourselves to any hazard, and Plantagenet is quite of my opinion. Therefore, my darling Lucy, I must tell you, as indeed it is the chief object of my letter to do, that I have fixed on this day week as our wedding day, and am positive y resolved on declaring my intintion to my aunt to-norrow My determination will soon allence her opposition, and therefore my darling Lucy, this is the last time you will have a letter signed by

"Your most attached, most sincere,
"and most affectionate

"EMMA WARREY"

"P S Plantagenet desires me to offer you his kindest regards, he is quite prepared to love the 'belle amie' of his Emma"

THE THREE MOONS.

THE palace of the Rana of Odeypoor, the head of the Rappoot tribes,-the Maharana,-revelled in the sunshine of prosperity, and in the expectation of festivities, that cordial to the soul of a Hindoo Light steps were bounding, and young hearts beating, within the zenanah, under the excitement of anticipated novelty. There was music and perfume in the air, and the hurrying to and fro of those busy in preparation. In every apartment of the zenanah the richest silks lay in careless profusion, embroidered with glittering gold and sparkling jewels Shawls of cashmere were piled in heaps, as presents to the expected guests. Gold and silver muslins to be wreathed into turbans at the fancy of the wearer, increased the gay variety, and not one somble cloud in the whole hnrizon served to remind mortal man that the sadness of human life ascends even to the thrones of princes

In a small apartment, at the very extremity of the zenanah, reclined Kishen Kower, the sole child of the Mahara-The curtains, of rose coloured silk of Persia, were a little withdrawn from the lattice, and she lay on her cushion with her eyes fixed on the clear blue sky, glowing like a sapphire, and unsultied by a cloud On the other side sat Ulsee, her favourite maiden, and at her feet stood Heera Bhase, her nurse and foster mother, looking upon her with a countenance in which love and grief struggled for the ascendancy.

Throughout Raipootana,-nay, from Thibet to Cape Comorin,-no woman possessed such radiant beauty as the princess of Odeypoor Her deep black eyes were like those of the gaze le in their star-like lustre, but they were informed by a spirit pure and tender as ever animated the breast of woman Though living in the retirement beseeming her rank and caste, the fame of the beauty of Kishen Kower was spread throughout the land It was the theme of every minstrel's song, it was the dream of every visionary's heart. The alliance of the Maharana, highly desira-13*

ble as it was on political grounds, was tenfold more keenly sought for the sake of so much beauty Contending princes had striven for the prize, but the two rajahs whose pretensions caused some hesitation in the decision of the Maharana, were Maun Singh, the sovereign of Joudpoor, and Juggut Singh, the sovereign of Jeypoor Indeed the contest had been pursoed so fiercely, that the rivals had at length resorted to the decision of arms, and war had been declared, when the Maharana thought to prevent the contest, by deciding in favour of Juggut Singh

But it was not so prevented Maun Singh did not tamely brook the defeat of his own hopes, and still less the triumph of his rival Each prince, therefore, led forth his battle array, and, though no decisive action had occurred frequent engagements, the results of which were dubious, had weakened both armies

In one of those intervals of tacit truce which each felt to be necessary for the recruiting of his energies, Bheem Singh, the Maharana, believed that the probable means of bringing them to peace would be by expediting the nup hals Consequently, Jugget Singh was summoned to celebrate his bridal festivities at the palace of Odeypoor

But the prince-albeit anxious to possess the coveted charms of Kishen Kower-was too much of a warrior to strike his tents without reluctance He desired vengeance on his rival, at least as keenly as the possession of his bride, and therefore he replied to the instances of the Maharana, that his glory required him to achieve some advantage yet ungained, before he should deserve to become his son Consequently the nuptials were long delayed. But now, at length, success had lent a lustre to the cause of the bridegroom, and believing that he had effectually deterred his rival from future efforts, he turned his face towards Odeypoor, and despatched a message to the Maha rana, desiring that preparations should be made forthwith for the marriage festivities, and therefore the palace echoed with voices of gladness, and all around wore an air beseeming the point of some high festival.

The fair brow of Kishen Kower was clouded, and pensiveness had chased from her lovely face the buoyant graces natural to it. But it was not, as the maldens of other regions might deem, that she was about to become the bride of an unseen bridegroom. By a Raipoot princess such a destiny is so surely anticipated from the very earliest years, that its fulfilment excites no other emotion than the natural regret of leaving familiar scenes Rishen Kower had wherewithal to alleviate this regret, for tales of the noble youth and nobler manhood of Juggul spirit tensarries.

Singh had been diligently carried to her ears by Heera. Bhave, and she had so much of the Llon's nature, as to share a warrior's pride in his prowess. Moreover a portait of Juggut Singh had been consepted to her, and his were, features on which a female eye rarely foods without admiration. Ulsee's engre tongue never wearied in dilating on the happiness of her who was destined to become the trunce of one so captivating, and the heart of Kishen Kower confessed, that his form was worthy of the daring swittle tenshried.

Still was the lady sad; and much and vainly did Ulseo ponder over the cause, for she dearly lock of the princes beneath whose gentle sway her days glided niway unmarked by one serrow or one complaint. To her the destiny of kishen Kower presented one long vista of all that can chirm the heart of woman, gratify her vanity, or fulfil the aspirings of ler ambitton. In vial therefore she searched through the small limit that circumseribed her thoughts; she could discern but one bright day of sunshine, and she looked for, but found not, the cloud which dinmed the far horizon in the keener evel of her young mistress.

There was a long silence, of which Usee was heartily tred. She looked from the enhandered scarf which her busy fingers were twisting into innumerable faintaits forms, to the princess, and an expression of pecy sinness trembled on her laps as 'she gazed on the lady's listless form, half raised from the silken cushon, whits the head rested on her small and exquisitely shaped hand, and her eye still remained fixed on the blue sky is visible through the lattice

Ulsee looked then at the face of Heern Bhuce, but she saw no hope there Taking courage, therefore, from the well known partiality of the princess, she ventured to breathe the name of Juggut Singh

The experiment was successful in attracting the attention of Kishen kower. She booked on her youthful attend ant with an eye which, if sad, was kind. "And what would Ulsee say of the princely Juggut Singh?"—she asked, for that never was an ungrateful theme

"Nay—twas but a word to disperse the andness of the prince's "ead Ulsee, happy that the tedous silence had yielded to her charm—"True it is that the Jeypoor rajab deserves praise, until the tongue of the speaker's red—and all the women of the zenanah protest that his picture is fairer than Vishnoo when he won the love of mortal women? Ted, havy, now this paregur of men approaches, and all things teil of love and joy, and still thou art sad as If—pardon me, dear lady—as if thou wert about to hie thee to the arms of hideous age—I do misdoibt thee much,

Heera Bhace," turning to the nurse whom she loved but little, for the manner of the aged woman was somewhat soured by suffering-" and I wrong thee greatly if thou, with thy ill omened wail of never ceasing woes, he not the cause why there is perpetual night in the mind of the pearl of pearls-kishen Kower-the fairest princess of a thou sand lands 13

"Peace, vain trifler" said Heera Bhace with even more than her usual sternness -"Is tons a time for thy light spirit to mingle its mirth with the darker notes breathed by the voice of destiny 2-knowed thou not-or hast thy folly forgotten-that as yet the house of the Maharana has of fered no propitiatory sacrifice to the goddess? Or dost thou think that the powers who endure from the first Yug until all power shall be overthrown, will fail to cla in the honours man has refused? Or dreamest thou that they will be eat isfied that man deems their rites may be neglected, when his interest interferes with the performance 2-Once more, peace-for the hour is solenin"

"It is an hour of as bright sunshine as ever gladdened mortal eyes " returned the indignant Ulsee, whose, spirit was patient beneath no other rebuke than that so rarely and so gently expressed by the princess ' But it is ever thus -Marriage feast or pious rite, all bear the ban of thy ill omened voice, and I would the Maharana himself heard thee with thy funeral croak so meet for this bright hour "

" It is meet !" said Heera Bhaee, and even Ulege felt the influence of her deep prophetic voice, which thrilled to the very heart of Kishen Kower-and she stood with folded hands, and her eye turned upwards, as if fixed on an object invisible to a less gifted vision

"Now wo is me 1' said Kishen Kower, wringing her small hands in agony, for, like all of her tribe, her eagle spirit cowered beneath the terrible bodings prompted by superstition "If thou knowest ought of evil about to be fall my father's house, Heera Bhace, speak it out, and boldly It shall work thee no ill, and keep not silent in a matter where she whom thou hast nursed at thy bosom, is so deeply concerned " "Happier, perchance, if thou hadst not been so nurtured " nuttered the nurse, the words rather escaping her, than voluntarily addressed to her anxious auditor Seeva to witness, that thou art dearer to me than any one of the children of my own youth 1 love i them but not like thee-not like thee, bright Kishen Kow 1 h ht of my soul, as thou always wert, the Maharana's airst aid cally born' There is ill threaten ng thee, fair flower of this princely house, but the shape of it is hidden from mine cyes

The sound of revel is in mine errs, and on every side faces of mirth and pleasure greet my aged eye, but my heart cannot share them, for clouds and drikness surround them all, and a voice of waiting drowns their joyous laugh, and perchance the bridegroom they expect is coming, for dimly in the distance I see him, but who is he?—I know oot, for he comes trapped in his shadow "

Kishen Rower bent her eyes to the earth When she raised them the sadness of their expression had assumed

a lofter character

"Let the evil that must be, be," she said in a low firm voice "The descendant of the princes of Odeypoor, and the betrothed of Juggut Singh, must oot shrink from her

lestiny 1

The princess sank into earnest contemplation. Heera Bhaee still preserved her attitude of sad affection, and Ulsee forgave the silence for which there now seemed to her an intelligible reason.

The moon had waned, and another moon was approaching the end of her second quarter, and again Kishen Kower aat sadly in her bower, and Heera Bhaee not her favourite handmaid were again the companions of her retirement.

But there were now no sounds of revel in the palace. The voice of the timbrels and the songs of the minetrel had ceased, and the footsteps which had bounded so lightly and so freely, now crept steathily along, as if fearful of awakening the echo. The array of glorious apparel had disoppeared, there was no sign of approaching festival. But the change was not the natural transition from rejoicings that have occupied the appointed hour, to the ordinary modes of existence. There was a deeper gloom in the air than that which results from the listlessness of sattey, it was the gloom of disappointment.

"Did I not tell thee," said Heera Bhace with her deep and mourful voice,—"did I not tell thee, that I saw not the face of the bridegroom, albeit the bridegroom was approaching? Yea, and he doth still approach, but vern yet I know h m not! But rouse thee process, and let not the! daughter of the Maharana bewail her solitariness, as if the world contained not ten thousand worther than Juggut Singli!

"And dost thou think, Heera Bhaee," demanded the princess, her dark ey el ashog with all the fire of her race, "dost thou think the daughter of Bheem the Lion bestows one thought of regret on the wretched traitor, who has dared thus to bring dishanoor on the head of his tribe? Thinkest thou that the prince of Jeypoor is more to me than the dust on which I trend? Knowest thou not that Kishen hower would bow herself down to be the hand maid of him who should humble the audacious traitor? Not for him I mourn, bot that Kishen Kower hath lived to bring sname upon the name of her father !"

"It is the vengeonce of Bhowanee" said Heera Bhaee blemnly 'Oh' would the the Maharana would add yet costher gifts than those already offered if perchance the last dread sacrifice might be overted Alast alast was the vi tim withholden only that it might be claimed at length, when its costliness was so fearfully increased ?"

"And might we not well deem, Heera Bhaee, that the penalty had been exacted and rendered to the uttermost? inquired Lishen Kower mournfully 'Hath not the alli ance of the Maharana been disdainfully spurned? Hath not shame unutterable been heaped on the head of his only -his most unhappy child? Have we not blushed to hear, that he who was so shortly to become the son of our house after suffering most inglorious defeat, bath purchased yet more inglorious peace at the price of broken troth and vi olated faith? Doth he not, even now, share the bridal wreath with the daughter of his haughty rivol-doth he not give his sister to that rival's orms-whilst Kishen Low er, doubly descrited and betrayed sits within her inner chamber, humbled to feel that she lives o dishonour and a shame to the nobest of the Roppoot race? Now, what wunld Bhowanee more?'

"Peace, peace, my child -Oh, provoke not her yet farther wrath, for she is fierce, and inexorable, and slow-very slow-to pardon' said Heera Bhase deprecatingly "Her voice crieth aloud for the offering of blood, and how her curse pursueth the victim that both been withholden mine aged eyes, O princess, yet weep to see, and thou yet livest to feel 12

"Alas alas Heera Bhaee," said Kishen Kower, yet more despondingly, " would that thou hadst not yielded to the fond pleadings of my mother for her first born 1 Thou who knowest so well what direful surrows the wrath of the offended goddess entails on those who dare to despise her mandates, and most on the victim that hath been demed, how couldst their nourish at thy bosom-how couldst thou lavish all thy dearest love on one, for whom thou must know all the honey dions of life would be turned to poison, who would hear the fur off sound of marriagefestival, and pronounce her bridegroom's name, but hall him never,—for whose dishonour her princely father was to shed tears a hundred fold more butter than the mourn ing for the dead,-who was to be widow and no wife? Alas' doth not even now the whole kingdom of Odeypoor bewail the shame that hath stanued the line of their sovereign? Will not the remotest of our tribs I ament the choid that hath fallen upon the head of their chief! and will not all these voices echo the curse of Bhowanee, that curse which should fall on thee,—on thee, Heren Bhaee, who disobeyed, and on me who lived but at thy will! Alas' what wis my offence in escaping a fate of which I was all unconscious? My feeble understanding knew not what the goldes required—my feeble hones could not perform the act of self immolation!—Alas' thine was cruel kindness!

"Thue sayest sooth," returned Heera Bhaee, "it was ruled by a baber than either thy mother or thy nurse Repreach me not, puncess, for the work which destury hath done, and clear thou thy brow. Perchance the cloud that darkens us may pass away, and Bhowanee may be appeased with a less costly sacrifice than the first. Sull, still, when thy planet hat night shone in its spiendour,—still I saw the coming bridgeroom, and again at midnight will I watch, if perchance, I may discern his face. Meanwhile, I will to the temple of the god-dess and chief thee, sweetest Kishen Kower! It cannot be that even Bhowanee will refuse to pity thee in this thine hour of extreme desolation."

Again the moon waned and the second moon was in her third quarter, gradually diminishing preparatory to be final disappe rance. It was midnight and Kishen Kowa was again in her inner chamber, rechining beneath the open lattice. All around was still as death, except when the silence was broken by the soniary tramp of the seathed. The eyes of the princess were fixed in the midnight heavens, as if she south to read the language of the stars. But to ker their anysterious symbols presented no more intelligation of the stars of the control of the condrols and inexplicable mechanism of this world, united

Depty humbled as Kishen Kower deemed herself—for to one of her ruik and caste the defection of her betrothed brines the sense of deep dishonair and inexpibile shaine—even to her whose pride of lineage was thus trainpiled in the dust the crim serenty of the hour imparted some of its own trainquility. She fit, also that forsitude which is the attendant of despair. She knew that her openny was mightier than any of the mightiest children of human birth. and that to that supernal enemy her own existence was a perpetual offence She knew that she breathed only by the commission of a crime deemed in the highest degree sacrilegious-that Bhowance had been defrauded of the firstborn-and that she was thus bringing her fearful vengeance on the head of the victim marked with her ban and of all to whom that victim was most dear. Hope of escape she felt there was none, for how could human strength strive against her whn, in her lawsible might, could hurl the chil dren of men to destruction by the whirlwind or the earth The Maharana and his whole household had thrice performed propitiatory rites, and thrice had the scowling sky answered with its dread array of fierce thun der and red lightning, and as the magnificent gifts were laid before the shrine of the goddess, and the smoke of countless sacrifices ascended to heaven no heart gathered hope that vengeance was at length satisfied, but the gloom which attends consciousness that something far more fear ful remains to be done, darkened over all

Rishen Kower's spirit, therefore, was now stilled with that preternatural calm which enables the suffers to contemplate unshrinkingly the doom that cannot be averted Sha had ceased to struggie against the proverful destiny that directed her path—she bent her eye fixedly on the one sole termination which could she believed, aver ther un of the Lion's dynasty, and without one strong emotions she

of the Lion's dynasty, and without one strong eawaited the pre-ordained moment of its arrival

Caimly, therefore, she realized on her silken couch, and her thought seeped are bound. I oher clouded mind there was no attring spell in the word elemity. She deemed of other modes of existence, undeed, and of other forms to be passed through even in this world, but the darkness of the dread future was unilumined, or illumined only by some unsteady meteor. She felt herself to be one awfully step apart from the human race and the first inituatory rise having been performed, as if only the consummation were needed for the perfecting of the scanfide.

Light but measured steps now caught her wakeful ear She recognised well those stately paces, and her heart sank from its unnatural elevation, and throbbed with some female terrors, as she felt in every fibre the approach of the proud sister of the Maharana Chand Bhace

The princess rose as she approached,—no greeting passed the in of either Kishen Kower bowed her lovely head with filial respect, but the mind of her haughty kinswoman was too much occupied to observe the quiet homage They stood in silence, and at length eye met eye, and it was 48

if the spirit of the one spoke thus to the spirit of the other Chand Bhace clasped the hand of the princess, and both?

sank on the silken couch

"The vengeance of Bhowanee continues insatiable," said Chand Bhaee "Thou seest, Kishen Kower, how shame! hath dimmed the glory of thy father's house! Thou feelest that his only child hath been put to open dishonour by the affinced spouse who hath shrunk from her espousals -But were this the worst, even this might be endured until the indignant heart of every Ramoot burst with its own bitterness But thou knowest not what farther evils men ace thy father's throne Not content with the shame he has wrought out for us, Juggut Singh hath concurred with his new father in law, to entreat the Maharana to seek none other allrance for his daughter, as our whole tribes can afford no fitting successor to occupy the relation for which they led forth their armies The resources of thy father. as thou knowest well offord no more hopeful means of coping with two such enemies, than if the flock of kids should array themselves against the tiger. The Maharana cannot-dures not-provoke their hostility. Then look thou upon the alternative! Thou, Kishen Kower, even thou, fairer than any among the daughters of thy peoplefrom being the pride of thy breage, must become its shame -must bring the foulest stain upon its glory Thou-the daughter not only of a Ramoot, but of the head of all the Raipoot tribes-thou must waste thy useless life in unwedded solitude-and the years of existence must be passed in bewailing thy virginity Or-"

Chand Bhaee paused, and her lofty eye looked full on the face of her young kinswoman

Or Kishen Kower must die Manaid the young princess, supplying the meaning which Chind Bhaee had left unspokin, and for an instant a shuddering chillness crept through her whole frame

"Thou hast spoken wisely," replied Chand Bhaee "It is fitting she should die 12

There was silence, and now that the dread moment was come, the heart of kishen Kower trembled

"But when?—but where?"—she wildly asked "Not now—not here! I would bud my father fareuel!—I would see once more the pleasant sun.—I would look yet again upon what I leave Some hours hence, and then—"

"Not so," said Chand Bhaee, firmly "Listen to my words, Kishen Kower Even on the morrow the messenger of the Rajahs departs, and for the safety of the Maharana, it were well he should bear the tidings that that which must be done, as done! Thy father too hath a heart weaker than the heart of the weakest woman In vain his ministers counsel—in vain he acknowledges that there is but this one way by which to escape dishonour or ruin the feebleness of human affection unnerves him, the Rappoot forgets the dignity of his caste, the Maharan haz ards the security of his kingdom, he feels only that he is thy father."

Kishen Kower wrung her hands in agony, and she went

with convulsive bitterness

"It remains for thee, therefore, in sacrificing life, to a surfice also all the solace with which thou mightest wish to surround its parting moments "continued Chand Bhace "For himself, in list all absorbing love of thee, thy father cannot think—think, therefore, for him? Save the king dom of the Maharans Save also thy family from dishon our, and surround thy name with glory forever, or if thou will live—see if thou canst brook the shame that must track thy future existence!"

Kishen Kower arose, and her young form seemed to di late beneath the strong emotion of her spirit. "Nay, but I am a Rapoot in heart and mind even as thos art, my kins woman," she said. "True that my evil destiny depresses my house, true that I hold my hie only to bring on it perpetual trials, from my birth, was not the band of Bhowa nee upon me? Let lear and wo, therefore, cease henceforth forever Propitious be the death which shall bring honour to my father, and glovy to his people!"

The princess paused, and thrice Chand Bhaee clapped her hands In instant obedience to the signal, Heera Bhaee appeared She bore a vase of a single beryl in her hand, and with a countenance which was as firm as it was melancholy, she tendered the cup to Kishen Kower

The princers received it. "All had been kinder, Heera-Blace, if the sacrifice had been made ere the victim had learned to love life," she said. "But the last words of the unusling shall not be reproaches, and she receives this draught from thee as thankfully as ever she quaffed the burning summer." Plous sees the bridegroom comes not burning summer. "Plous sees the bridegroom comes not say to make the property of the burning summer." But have been supported by the bridegroom comes not say to make the property of the burning summer. A comfort all who fove me. And now, Blowance, the exprantory scarfice is scomplete".

She raised the chalice to her pale lips, and quaffed it to the very dregs

.. So perished Kishen Kower!

THE SICK CERTIFICATE.

Ir was towards the close of day in August, and the sun was going down dimly and gloomily The sea was white, pale, and death like, as it lay quietly under the heavy clouds that girdled the horizon, forming the sea bank, portentous of storm and wind The air was damp and heavy, and the eye turning landwards was still impressed by sad im ages-by bare and rocky hills, whose summits were half hidden in the curling mist-by masses of trees, mangoes, cocoas palmiras, plantains, whose pleasant green gloomed through that dim and twilight atmosphere like melancholy gray No rain had fallen during the day It was one of those breaks in the monsoon when the sufferer actually seems to inhale steam, and when every breathing of the invalid appears a gasp for life Not a breeze to pass over the throbbing temples, or to wave the lightest leaf that ever hung on tree or shrub! It seemed to the drooping ener gles of the pale beings who were gazing on the scene, as

There were two persons looking out alternately upon the land and the sea with feelings of the most painful in terest-a husband and wife The former was evidently suffering from some severe malady, the cheek of the lat ter was as palled as his own, and her eye, if its glance were somewhat less leaden, was still shaded by an anxiety which words never express His hand was clasped in her's and his head rested against her bosom as she stood with her arm encirching his neck, and they seemed, sufferers as they were, not to be wholly without comfort, as they clung together thus lovingly

Their silence had continued some time, for their hearts were filled with thoughts to which neither cared to give utterance At length Captain Darnley, for so was he called, drawing the beloved form on which he leaned still more closely to him, asked her, 'And you do not think I im-prove much then-do you. Anne, dearest?'

"A little, dear, a little, I hope and trust," replied the wife soothingly, willing to impart the comfort she required, and had not! "You know your appearance never changes very much, and-"

"Oh, Anne, Anne, but it does change, my darling girl Look at this vest! it is not so long since it fitted me closely

-and the sleeves-and-alas, am I not changed ?"

"Oh, thinner, Darnley, thinner, to be sure You know in this country how soon one is pulled down! And then recovery is always so slow! One can scarcely see any improvement, though, in fact, one is improving, dear Now do be cheered, my own dear husband! Let us think how happy we shall be in sweet, beautiful, beloved England, how soon we hope to be there Is it not quite delightful, Darnley 7"

"Oh, yes, yes it is delightful, if we were but sure! Tell me again what Thompson said 2" "He said, 'India will not do for Darnley, he must go home' And then be asked me if I should like it, and need I tell you, dear how frankly and cordially and rapturously I answered, 'Xos, yes, yes,' a hundred times? And his words were, 'We must send him, then' I could only exclaim, 'Without delay' without delay?' And off he went, promising to come again this evening" "It is getting late, I wish he would come Why does he not give me the certificate at once?"

"Oh, but after what he has said, there cannot be the shadow of a doubt on the matter, you know, dear George An officer's word is so sacred, -and a professional man, too, -of that profession, moreover, which so imperiously requires from its practitioners the greatest rectitude and hon our and good feeling! Oh, I cannot for an instant think that he will fail us It is impossible " "Heaven bless you for that hote, my dearest, and I might feel it, too, if -" The appearance of the person to whom he was referring, interrupted the sentence

Doctor Thompson was the medical officer of Darnley's regiment. In the east every professional man is called "doctor" by courtesy, or rather was, for in our days the influence of "the schoolmaster" is, in some unimportant

details, reaching to this ultima Thule of civilization

Mr Assistant Surgeon Thompson, for such was his bond fide style and title, was a short, thick, bluff looking personage, about thirty years old, with a pair of prom-nent lack lustre red eyes, sleek black hair, hanging straight, lanky, and damp over his forehead, and leaving on the collar of his jacket evident indications of its too great lengthiness Over h s burly looking face an expression of great meekness and loving kindness was superinduced, and it was not until after two or three interviews that you detected in the oblique, lateral glances of his eyes a senti ment which could be translated only into a looking out keenly after his own interest. He had the character of being a very inoffensive man. He was civil to everybody, and almost too attentive to his patients. He had such a con viction of the infallibility of the commanding officer for the time being as befitted a person of his humble temper. which did not permit him to place his own judgment in competition with that of his superiors. He was fortunate in quickly discovering the good qualities of any officer who happened to have influential connexions, and commendably prudent in eschewing the society of such refractory youths as ventured to canvass the doings of their bettersconducting himself altogether with landable discretion amongst the promiscrous society of the mess table, avoiding any intermeddling with the opinions and assertions commonly ventured there

Captain Darnley was only a gentleman by birth, education, and by principle He had nothing beyond his pay, and those chinging relics of youthful folly-his debts. Moreover, he had a young and accomplished wife, but as home was his object he economized to the utmost, and, to Mr Assistant Surgeon Thompson's gently expressed surprise. saw little society, and "gave no feeds" He had no interest in India-no expectations from patronage. His relations, aristocratic as they were, could do nothing for him, they had no Indian influence Captain Darnley was, to add to his other misfortunes a popular man with his corps generally, and as Lieutenant Colonel Bore, at that time commanding, was very much the reverse, it follows, of course, that Darnley was no favourite at head-quarters. and, as another necessary consequence, none with Doctor Thompson, save and except a slight saving clause on the score of prospective contingencles

To return to the hall of Captain Darnley's house

"Bless my soul, Darnley 's sald the professional gentle man, endeavouring to light up his face to an explosion of "Why, you're quite onother man! I declare I should scarcely have known you, you look so amazingly better

"Then my looks sorely belie my feelings," sald Darn ley, cold'y, and as quietly as he could "I am very ill tonight, Thompson, and I wish you would give me something composing !

"To be sure, my dear sir, to be sure,' returned Thompson, with great warmth of manner, "we shall be able to manage that very easily, that is, if we find from the symn-

150

toms, you know-But I beg your pardon, Mrs Darnley, mon my word I was so engrossed by Darnley's evident improvement that I really did not see you How do you find yourself this evening? You look but poorly "

"Oh, but I feel much better," returned Mrs Darnley "You know the progress of my disorder is greatly affected by the state of my mind, and since you declared your intention of sending Captain Darnley home, I am beginning to feel quite strong in the hope of seeing dear England shortly "

"True, true, to be sure, that is, if he requires it, you know, for of course I should be unwilling to send him away, except in a case of absolute necessity, for his own sake," said Doctor Thompson, smoothly "It adds so much to an officer's term of slavery! And really, if Darnley goes on improving at this rate, I hope and believe it will be needless " "Really, now, doctor, you must excuse my disagreeing with you," said Mrs Darnley, who saw, with a trembling heart, the shadow that was settling on her husband's brow. "It is not many hours since you saw Captain Darnley, and how the improvement has occurred, or wherein it con sists. I confess myself at a loss to discover In short, my dear Doctor Thompson, I think the certificate quite as ne cessary now as it was this morning; and I think morecver, and I assure you I am a deeply interested observer, that it is probable it will not be less necessary a month hence, if you intend keeping us here so long "

I intend? My dear madam, I have no intention in the matter but that of doing my duty, and that duty requires me to assure you, that you, at least, ought not to remain in India another day, if it could be avoided "

"Go without my husband 1' exclaimed Mrs Darnley, in a tone and with a gesture of horror "Never, if death be the alternative"

"Nevertheless, you must go, my dear Anne," said her husband calmly "And as for me, we will talk about that another time"

"No, we will talk about it now, George," returned Mrs Darnley, collecting herself-" we will talk about it now, as is most fitting and proper, where interests so dear to both of us are at stake. And I will assure Doctor Thompson that he, as an unmarried man, may perhaps be excused for imagining such treason against woman's heart, as to believe the wife capable of leaving the sich husband in a clime so hostile , But you, Darnley, ought to deem better of me , However, doctor, let me tell you frankly, if you think it inconsistent with your dnty to send Captain Darnley away, be it so ;-do nothing against such convictions . Our alternative must be to procure leave to visit the presidency, and see whether the medical gentlemen there disagree with you-whence we shall call on you for a statement of Darnley's case, and your mode of treatment"

"You take up my words too hastily, Mrs Darnley," said Doctor Thompson, whose naturally red face glowed purple beneath the searching eye of the anxious wife "I did not say that a sick certificate for Darnley would be absolutely unnecessary ,-but we must take time-and think about it-and, in short, I dare say we shall be able to arrange matters very well-but do not let us be too hastynothing like deliberation, you know-hey, Captain Darnley -Oh, we shall do very well "

Darnley turned from him with ill concealed disgust But his wife had greater self command, and she once more repeated calmly the assurance, that if, on the morrow, Darnley showed no change of symptoms, either Doctor Thompson must give the necessary certificate, or Darnley would forward an application to army head quarters for leave to visit the presidency forthwith

' I trust Darnley will be better in the morning," was Doc tor Thompson's parting wish "At any rate, if he is not, it will be time enough then to decide on sending him away So good night, Darnley ,-keep yourself up ,-good night, Mrs Darnley, -take care of yourself, and be good spiriledyou must go home at least " And so he left them, hasten ing away to prevent Mrs Darnley's accurately anticipated reply

The husband and wife turned their eyes on the countenance of each other, and read feelings and indignation too deep for words They stood in sad silence for a few min utes, interrupted at length by Captain Darnley's continuing the train of his thoughts, and saying—" Well, Anne, was I deceived?-Did not I tell you yonder man was never to be relied on if permitted to escape for a moment from your own immediate observation "

"He is a base and time-serving wretch," exclaimed Mrs Darniey with unusual warmth, in words wrung from her by the bitterness of the suffering to which she knew full well they were exposed "Bot do not droop, dearest George ;-believe me we will go home, and ..."

"At least you must, Anne, even this idiot can see the necessity of your remaining no longer in a climate like

"Do not talk of parting, Darnley," said his wife earnestly, and in a manner almost solemn "I will never leave you, -thy bome shall be my home-and where thou lest there will I also be buried "-And she burst into a passion of

tears and long they wept in each other's arms

When they looked up from that sad embrace, the dim
ness of the closing day had passed away The jull moon had risen and was shining, as it never shines beyond the tropics, with a splendour that brought out every object in strong relief The sea lay beneath its rays, one broad sheet of silver, and the outlines of the hills were traced in marked distinctness The sweet fragrance of that shrub known familiarly in India as 'the Burmese creener,' which threw its fairy boughs, hung with bells varying through all shades from white to crimson, over an arched trelliswork, streamed into the ball through the open venetians, inviting the invalid to approach and enjoy the balmy breeze which its persume enriched

Arm in arm Darnley and his wife passed into the gar They walked some time in silence unbroken by any other communion than that occasional pressure of the band which told whither their thoughts were turning Darnley at length seemed fatigued, and threw himself on the bench beneath the Burmese creeper

"Is this safe, dear or said the anxious wife, inhaling the air more freely, as if thus she wished to ascertain whether any vapours there could injure the frail frame of the being who was the whole world to her

"There is not a particle of moisture abroad, my dearest," The sea breeze has sprung up, and it is so re freshing after this dismal day !-Go and get your shawl, Anne,-the breeze is almost cold,-come back to me quickly "

She left him, and Darnley, restless and uneasy, rose to walk He paced to the extremity of the avenue, and he paused to look down on the sea, as the surf beating more violently every moment, broke upon the rocks wave was crested and his heart throbbed strongly, as if to welcome the freshening breeze. He panted for his home His very spirit was sickening as he saw the wife of his bosom fading under the influence of the tropical sundrooping notwithstanding ber efforts to collect her energies And he knew that to achieve this end there was but one visible means, and whether that was to be within his grasp or not, depended on the fiat of a man whom, in his deepest soul, he despised with absolute loathing

Louder than the dashing of the ocean the voice of his thoughts rose within him But what sound can drown the faintest whisper of the human being who is the object of strong passion-whether of love or hate?

Above the roaring of the surge-above his own turnult-nous feelings. Darnley of that Instant caught the voice of Thomason With no consciousness of the maral bearing of the acnon, panting and breathless with strong emotion, he stood leaning against one of a group of mungusas. And as be listened he heard words like these

"But, my dear Captain Ashton," expostulated Doctor Thompson,- if you could but have witnessed the violence of Mrs -- mention no names-safe plan you know, -you would have been positively shocked I assure you. upon my honour as a medical man, her threats absolutely terrified me,-and really-upon the whole, I think the best thing we can do will be to send them off instanter"

"Ruin-rinn-my good fellow," returned his companion, whom Darnley would instantly have recognised if the address of Doctor Thompson had not already pointed him "To let Darnley once quit these shores without first getting fairly out of my way, will be actual destruction to my prospects And then consider, Thompson, how much the corps will be benefited by such a step It is not my Interests only that are concerned Look of the heutenants. pay, ensigns of scien years' standing'-llow ore they looking out for Darnley, think you?- to, no-Thompson, you owe it to us to keep him here until he is fairly sickened. In another month he will be glad to go oway on any terms, Let him have the certificate in Heaven's name, conditional-In And what matters it to him whether he invalids or not? His expecting ever to arrive of the majority is obsurd. He keeps others back without ony earthly benefit to himself. Really, I think we are positively his best friends, in foreing him to do that which every rational being must see well enough that he ought to have done long since"

"Well, of course, you know best," returned Doctor Thompson "I wish to do every thing I can to please the regiment. And you know, Captain Ashton, the Zillah of Bonore will shortly be vacant, and a word from you at the adjutant general's office ----

'Will surely not be wanting" added Captain Ashton, and more he might have said, but Darnley's phrensy was no longer to be kept within bounds. Animated by the innat ural strength of passion, he cleared the hedge at one bound, and confronted the astonished pair -" Scoundrels and cowards 1 '-he gasped, and further utterence was sus pended by ungovernable emotion

In a moment Captain Ashton saw his advantage, and regained his usual coolness. Perhaps he lied not been thrown off his equilibrium three times in the course of his life He was proverbially cool,-calm beneath looks of contempt which did all but speak daggers,—calm beneath the general disgust that caused his presence to be shunned almost as a contagion, calm beneath whisp-red taunts and inuendoes that would have maddened a sersitive man, and have nerved to manual repulse any arm but that of a coward

And at this moment he felt he had the hon in the to ls he saw with the eye of the practised hundsman who watches the tiger he has just chafed,—with such an eye Captain Ashton marked the pale, quivering hip,—the dis tended nostril,—the foam each breathing drew forth from Darnley, and he knew well that he was utterly beyond self command The presence of Thompson was his own safe guard, and also, for the cool soldier was collected enough to extend a very prospective view into the future, his best evidence in the criss to which the maddened Darnley was surely hastening

Therefore, addressing himself to his victim, he inquired deliberately, with the air of a man all unconscious of aught base or wrong, to what he was indebted for the honour of Cantain Darnley's presence at so unexpected a moment, and in a manner so utterly unprecedented?

Such an address was to throw fuel on the flame. The rage of Darnley became every instant more violent, and his body shook strongly beneath the force of his tremen dous passion

"Ashton," said he, with a voice boarse, but subdeed mix an unnaural and frightful calmens of tone, "I have ever deemed you a cold, calculating, selfish knave, who beyond the sphere of your own vie interests, eared for nothing, loved nothing, and I have avoided you accordingly, said honest men avoid you I know that for your own misera ble advancement, you would be content to sacrifice the lives—the hope of tens of thousands"

"Sir," interrupted Captain Ashton, "you may Spare yourself the trouble of an haraogue, and of the vain expenditure of an eloquence which cannot but prove injurious to your constitution in its present enfeebled state I request you to leave my premise, where you are an intu der—equally unwelcome and undesired "

"Now mark me, Asbton," said Darnley in a louder voice, "if I live until this arm is ooce more nerved, I will call you to such account for this as shall try the strength of your crafty sou! 'I know you, Sr, now, I have overheard jour projects, and I trust the Almighty God will not allow prespertly to your foul villany. You pursue your snakely course, hidden beneath the shadow of others, but leaving your fully alms. or will you touch, you four wing. have tracked your windings! And for your worthy coadjutor, I shall find a day for him too, albeit the stake of one hon est man's life is all too much to set against the polluted ex Istence of two such wretched cowards and villains Captain Ashton note it well-mark it well, I lell you to your teeth you are har, enward, and scoundrel," and Darn ky, still nerved by his phrensy, left the compound as he had entered lt.

The excitement lasted until Darnley had reached his couch. Then, when the moment of reaction came, faint, breathless, cold dews bursting from every pore, he lay in a ctate of infantine weakness, or of utter unconsciousness There needed no busy messenger to tell his wife what had occurred When she returned to seek Darnley, she heard his voice in altercation with Captain Ashton, and the very sight of his companion explained to her that he must have been the audilor of some irritating communication, and that his impetuosity had urged him instantly to seek their presence and tell them so

It was a night of terrible anxiety to that devoted wife The husband of her choice, the beloved of her youth, lay on his couch languid, exhausted, unconscious of her care, insensible to her voice. Far from bringing them nearer to the longed for period of their quitting India, this event admitting it to have only the happiest results, must retard their departure And she felt that, of Darnley's ul timate recovery, an immediate change to the blessed air of his native shore, afforded the single hope He had experi e iced no improvement even when all around was tran quillity, and how would be now endure the excitement necessarily attendant on the consequences of that action, which she well knew would be construed into a military Offence ?

But when she contemplated those consequences, her spl nt did not fail she almost wondered at the calmness and fortitude with which she regarded that which might proba bly entail on them litter rain She knew enough of the regulations of the service to be aware that, admitting the case to be proved, there was but one sentence to be pro nounced by a court martial animated by the most favourable feelings-dismissal And then, what would become of them, destitute as they were of resources? The very circumstance under which they would, in that case, return to their native country, wund weer an appearance of dis-grace, which might afford some plea of justification to the coldness of friends, too willing, alas! to be cold when their friendship is most needed Such a prospect was dreary enough, but, as she afterwards confessed, her heart was at that trying season strongly, strongely supported

Long before the anterpated visit of the adjutant, Darnelpy had recovered consciousnes, and even composure His wife had heard, from his own lips, the conversation between Ashton and Thompson, of which he had been an auditor, and her hopes gathered strength as she listened Darnley did not for a moment attempt in conceal from her his conviction that the harshest proceedings would immediately be instituted, and he was satisfied whin she know the whole, and her fortitude shrank not. He was more—he found conflict in her comfort.

"Always make me aware of the real nature of our powton," she was accustomed to say "God gave me to you as your friend and belpmate and how can I be u-full you in e there cherecter, if half that I ought to know is, from mistaken corr-duration, concealed from me? I might as well attempt to had a person through a dangerous road blindfolded "

The adjutant entered the ball with a most reluction step Darnley was lying on a couch, and Mrs. Darnley rose to result the step of the s

Percy, you are come for Darnley's sword?

"Such is the painful office that his fallen to me in this unfortunate business? replied Mr Percy.

"Darnley, my good fellow, the whole regiment sy impatitizes with you, though we have heard nothing but what that disgusting Thompson has thought fit to mismute. We are quite sait isfied that you have had great provocation"

Darnley and his wife together explained the whole mat ter "Precious part's said Mr Perco, who had listened attentivel) "Do not be discouraged, Darnley, I don't apprehend any ultimate evil to yourself, whatever the numediate result may be. To tell you the truth, old Bore is perfectly delighted that he has been puble for lay his hand on you. He and Ashton have been, closeled ever since parade this morning, and the doct, to, which send for the termination of the conference. They have framed they considered the course, they have framed they may be the previously to the breaking up of the conference.

There was the peramble, as usual, "for conduct unbecoming the character of a nofficer and in gentleman," exhibited in three instances, first, in Darnley's having unwarrantably forced himself on the presence of Captan Ashton, by overleaping a fence which separated their respective compounds, and remained there contrary to the express deaire of Captain Ashton, secondly, in having, at the same time and place, without any provocation, threatened Cap tain Ashton with a challenge to fight a duel, and, thirdly, in having applied to him the terms "har and cow ard," with other violent and abusive language—the whole being in breach of the articles of war

Such is an outline of the charges, which Darnley read over with a smile of pure, unmixed contempt. Not that he was blind to the fact of the necessary sentence that must follow their pening proved, but he disalmed, with the deepest scorn, the malignant hitterness that had so striven for his ruin, and shrunk from encountering him where—bad and lamentable as the fact is—a soldier believes all his personal prievances ought to meet redress.

It would he idle to follow the thoughts of the suffering pair through all the mazes in which they deviated during the interval which necessarily intervened before the day of trial In the all absorbing occupation of his mind, Darn ley's bodily sickness was almost disregarded True, he was feeble as a child, but the pains that had once tortured every limb, had for the present ceased, and so far he was in a state of comparative ease. If ever woman was what God designed her to be-a helpmate for man-Airs Darnley was that woman Unwearied in her attention untiring in her patience, she listened with ready ear to all the conjectures with which his sickly mind occupied itself, she aided his weakness, by her evident fortitude she taught him resignation, and by the piety which was her best support at all times, and now felt indeed as a rock of defence, she was enabled to trust Him "who tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb," and to contemplate the future without despair

And she had much to occupy her There was one soil tary point in which she could ask counsel of noue but her own bosom, and long and frequent were her communings with that counsellor To open to Darnley the secret with which her thoughts were occupied, would but inflict on him an anxiety tenfold more ernel than her own, and force on ber the task of hightening his apprehensions whist she had to combat her own Therefore, after much consideration—after bringing every facility of her mind to hear upon the subject—after having devoutly and humbly sought guidance and light from "the fountain of all wisdom," she took courage, and did boldly that which she believed her highest duties called on her to do

Before the charges against Darnley were returned from the adjutant general's office to his regimental head-quarters, a simple but copious statement of his case had been

privately conveyed to one who, whatever might be the fiat of the court martial, had the approval or disapproval of it in his power. The statement took a retrospective view of the dreadful state of bodily suffering to which Captain Darnley had for so many months been a prey, it went on to record various instances of annoyance on the part of Captain Ashton, which, though too akilfully contrived to be tangible, were not the less likely to irritate a high feeling man, who was conscious of their design, and writhed beneath their effects It asserted, also, the hostility of Colonel Bore, his close alliance with Captain Ashton and cer tain occurrences in which nothing but Captain Darnley's interference had prevented the grossest violation of all discipline It revealed the system under which Doctor Thompson had acted-that, alarmed by the evident danger of Darnley, he had volunteered to give him a sick certifi cate to England, that, so far from improving, Captain Darnley had daily become worse, up to the very evening when the events occurred on which the charges preferred against him had been framed It disclosed the tergiversation manifested on that evening by Doctor Thompson, which had naturally tended to irritate Capiain Darnley to excess It then went on to relate without comment, verbatim, the conversation overheard by Darnley between Captain Ashton and Doctor Thompson, when Darnley, irritated to phrensy by auch palpable demonstration of the evil influence that was at work against him, was impelled to that unfortunate violence which had reduced him to his present dangerous predicament

"If the opinion of a man's fellows," thus it concluded, "be satisfactory evidence of his character, then let all Darnier's brother officers be called on to bear record Ask of them whether he be not of courage as noble as ever animated the pulse of officer and gentleman, yet of heart gentle to the lowest and weakest ? Ask of them whether his integrity stand not on so proud a basis, that his word alone is sufficient to authenticate any fact for which he pledges it? Ask of them whether, although he insist on subordination to the utmost, he be not the unweared friend of every addier under him, the patient investigator of their claims—the merciful instructer of their ignorance?—the most honourable gentleman, the most upright man, the truest of friends the most indulgent of masters, and ah the tenderest of husbands! What mighty provocation must that have been which could rouse so brave and gentle a spirit to the commission of the violence of which he stands accused i And what, after all, was that violence? Exists there a man, who, under such an outrage, would bave done less than brand the perpetrators of it with names such as well befitted them? Were they less black than he charged them with being? And although to repel such charges, men of honour hourly peril their lives, with the offence of provoking them to such an act he cannot be charged, for his accusers have borne more than this, and still they and their enemies remain unscathed? They have borne the withering sarcasm, and the bitter taunt, until it has become familiar to their ears, and the first wound they have affected to feel on their honour, has been inflict ed at the precise moment when they had power to skreen themselves behind the military law, and vindicate their in jurd reputation by bringing ruin on their opponent, for that which, after all, amounts to no more than a breach of military elequett."

The day of trial arrived, and Darnley, the prisoner, was carried from his palankeen into the presence of the court. Worn and attenuated as he was palled and changed, his calm and composed eye bore evideoce that all was at peace Many a one of the members of that court looked on him with pity and respect. Darnley was so well known for all that soldiers love as brightest and best, and the circumstances of his case came so home to men's business and bosoms, that it must be avowed the convocation was hardly prepared to consider the facts impartially Captain Ashton, moreover, was what is technically called in the army, a marked man a party be had indeed, for he had interest, and time servers and sycophants, the servile and selfish, are to be found everywhere But it had been emphatically observed of him, by one well calculated to judge, "He had brothers and sisters, kinsmen and wife but he was the friend of no man, and no man was his friend " Men felt that they could have no sympathy with one who stood aloof from them in cold solitariness, and whether he were loved or respected the least, it might have embarrassed the profoundest metaphysician to determine

It is not intended in this place to paint all the forms of the proceedings. The judge-advocale-general was a mao well skilled in all the routine of his department, and every thing, as might be expected, was regular even to the letter. The trial occupied but a few hoors. Darnley's defence was read by the judge-advocate, and the sensation with which it was received, proved the force of the mainly plainness with which the facts were recorded as they stood The court adjourned until the following day, when they again assembled to record the sentence, and witness the signing and sealing of the proceedings

When the trial was absolutely finished-when Darnley

knew that so far his fate was decided-he resigned himself to patient expectation of the return from the commander in-chief He felt that if he had hazarded the provision for his own existence-and for that of the wife far dearer to him than life-he had now done his utmost to redeem his error Sometimes, although he felt that his pa-tience had been tried beyond the limits of man's endurance, he looked on the pale cheek of that beloved being once so fair, and repented in bitterness that he had given his enemy this advantage over him. But the voice of her consolation, always ready to minister to his wounds, soothed the anguish of his remorse, and awakened him to hope Yes-to a higher and better hope than any this frail world, with all its glorious pegeantry, can bestow-even to that hope from which she had gathered strength to support her, when the poor body that enshrined her spirit seemed debilitated to that pinable weakness for which there is rest only in the grave

The proceedings returned, and a division order commanded the attendance of the general sisff, of the commanding officers and staff of the station, and of the commanding officers, staff, and all other European commissioned officers of Darnley's regiment, at eleven A M. on the following morning. The whole place was in commotion. Horses, buggies, palankeens, all were put in requision, and there was the hurrying to and fro, as of meabent on an important object,—after all, the inquiry perhaps of the Athemans, "Is there any new thing? "Whippers of the Athemans, "Is there any new thing?" Whippers of the Athemans, "Is there any new thing? "Whippers of the Athemans, "Is there are no many? The part of the Athemans, is the many that he sent the staff of the important despatches. In short, many hearts beat more strongly than those of the sick prisoner and his wife, and other casts, perhaps, trembled with more fearful apprehensions than those of that afflicted pair.

On the following day, all who had been summoned, attended at the head-quarters of the division. There was a splendid display of the "pomp and circumstance" of military decoration. There was the scarlet, and the gold, and the embroidery, and the rating of swiss and of spurred heels, and the glatter of helmets with their waving plumes. And Darnley was there too, prayed his gorgeous trappings, but without that aword which had done so much good service against the foes of his country, —without that sword which perhaps was to be restored to him no more.

The finding of the court was read, pronouncing the prisoner guilty of every instance of the charge, save and except the words in the preamble describing his conduct as

"unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman." and also the words "without provocation," in the second instance The sentence of coorse was dismissal, but "under the circumstances of the case," the document went on to state, "the court felt jostified in earnestly recommending the prisoner to the merciful consideration of his excellency They begged respectfully tocall the attention of his excellen cy to the long and painful illness under which Captain Darn ley had previously been labouring-an illness which, up to the present moment exerted its distressing influence—an illness which his own medical attendant had pronounced incurable in this country, and as a remedy for which, that very medical attendant, Assistant Surgeon Thompson, had himself prescribed a return to Europe The court begged strongly to remark on the evidence given by that officer, being, as he was, the single witness subpornaed in support of the prosecution, also on the framing of the charge, which had been so constructed as to remove from Assistant Surgeon Thompson the appearance of being one of the parties against whom Captain Darnley's unfortunately violent expressions had been directed. The court having evidence to the fact, which, indeed, the prisoner had not denied, were bound by their oath to find him 'guilty,' and to record sentence of dismissal accordingly. But viewing the aggravated nature of the provocation—being no less than a conviction that be had been deluded in the hopes extended by the very man who had appeared on his trial as evidence against him,-the court felt it their high and imperative duty earnestly to repeat their recommen dation of Captain Darnhy to the most favourable consid eration of his excellency the commander in chief, that a valuable and greatly respected officer might not be lost to the Company's service, for an offence which, grave as it might be in its military character, involved not the slight est taint of moral turnitude The court, therefore, relying on the known, &c &c &c"

And then came the remarks of the commander in chief, commencing, according to the formal routine, with his excellency's disapproval. The very finding, it said, ought to have guided the court to pronounce a less severe pumishment, since they had exonerated the prisoner from "conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gent'e man," and had also founded their recommendation of his case to the favourable consideration of his excellency, on the grounds of the extreme provocation that had led Captain Daraley to so violent an expression of his feelings, as had unfortunately placed him in jeopardy. Much as the commander in-chief lamented the intemperance of which Captain Darnley had been guilty, his excellency concurred with the court in pronouncing the protocation extreme, indeed he had satisfaction in bear inchas testi more of the properties of his experience. He congratulated Captain Darnley on the almost unanimous testimony his brother officers had so nobly borne to his high and unimpeachable integrity. The commander in chief expressed his satisfaction in being able to restore to their fellowship an officer so greatly, and—so far as he could be guided by the records now submit ted to him—so deservedly beloved. He directed, no clusion, that Captain Darnley should be released from ar rest, and return to bis duty forthwith.

Scarcely did the impatient audience allow the sonorous voice of the assistant adjustant general to subside into its concluding pause, before, forgetful of the etiquette of the meeting, finands were extended to grasp Darnley's, and eyes were beaming with congratulation and delight, and witspered praises were haining his restoration to his proper place. The lips of many a brave man trembled then with most of the proper place in the proper place. The lips of many a brave man trembled then with most of the proper place and the proper place in the proper place. The place place is the proper place in the place plac

The meeting dissolved and surrounded by a galland the land of the cantonment. They arrived as his door, and his happy friends parted with him there, for they knew well who was awaiting with fear and trembling, within his home

It was a moment of deep joy Darnley felt that its pecul har character singled it out from all other moments of his life, when he clasped in his arms the being who had been saved from uter destitution, and who now, looking in his face, exclaimed, "Tell me nothing,—I read it all there." You are acquitted, and trumphant, I am sure you are."

And he confirmed the blassful assurance, and detailed, so far as his agitation would permit, the occurrences of the morning. And he tasted yet another honey drop in the cup of that day's blass, for he learned then, for the first cup of that day's blass, for he, in the depth of her wife-his devotion, had seen with she, in the depth of her wife-his devotion, had seen with a morning that our wife-his devotion, had seen with a morning that the rejoined the morning that the rejoined the morning that the respective to the firmness of the gentlest being that ever smoothed the pillow of sixthers a most head the pillow of sixthers and the pillow of sixthers.

In the division orders of that day, there oppeared an extract from general orders, removing Colonel Bore from the command of Darnley's regiment, and, almost at the same hour, Mr Percy visited the happy pair, to notify that Ashton and Thompson had both been placed in arrest, and that charges against them, framed at the presidency, had actually arrived by the very dâl, which conveyed Darnley's acountial

That was a day of loud revelry at the mess It was not what is called a public day, but every officer brought so many friends with him, that it seemed as it the whole can tonment had gathered there to celebrate a festival. Many a health was quaffed to Darnley and his wife, and loud and long were the encommunis lavished on them 'They enoyed a deeper and holter thankfulness in the quiet of their own home—happy in their prosperity, as they had been resigned beneath their trial

Darnley went to the presidency so soon as his evidence had been given on the trials of Captain Ashton and Doctor Thompson Indeed their conspiracy had already been sufficiently proved in the former investigation and form only rendered the repetition of it necessary Darnley and his wife felt no triumph when they knew that their adver sames were disgrated and ruined. The moment of their own restoration to happiness had been that of forgiveness And very shortly India, with all its train of sorrow, and suffering and gaudy misery, where life is a skeleton dressed in glittering robes became to them as a land viewed in the visions of the night. For Darnley at the presidency procured the certificate that enabled him to return to his father land, and he quitted it no more By representations in the proper quarter, and the kindness of a friend, he realized an income abundantly sufficient to afford him and the beloved of his heart every comfort, and some of the few luxuries that tempted their moderate wishes In one of the southern counties, near the sea, stands his rose cover ed home, the cynosure to which many an Indian wander er's eye has been turned, and where hospitality has never cheated the expectations of those whose past kindness gave them the slightest claim to seek it

CAPTAIN PHILIPSON'S CAREER.

Amover the memoranda of our Lne'e Philipson who died off the Cape in June, 1830, on his passage from India to England, we find the following reminiscences, explains tory of the unfortunate circumstance of his having inclining to bequeath to his heirs, after them firely years existed to the control of the world the control of the said service, and will at once save them the pain of "recounting all their miseries" of engan," and check the fervent aspiration of bungry aspirants after their speedy dissolution, by demonstrating than that with which their imaginations have invested it.

"People who anticipate death, generally betake them selves to making a will I, the writer of this document, be ing under the influence of that expectation, do declare that I abstain from such testamentary disposal of my estates, from the mere circumstance of having none to bequeath In place of them, I desire to give the benefit of my expe rience to my heirs, that they may be attracted to, or warn ed from, a similar dedication of their time, accordingly as they are capable, or otherwise, of receiving to their bosoms stern and unpulatable truths, instead of vain but delightful delusions These memoranda of my career will, in my judgment, exculpate me from the charge of having disre garded opportunities of accumulating wealth or having squandered it when accumulated, in the view of every can did mind, if any such there be amongst a crowd of d sap pointed heirs To them, therefore I give, all I have to bestow, these chronological series of the events of my life in India

"I am a cadet of 1806 My ensign's commission bears the date of the following year In the autumn of that year I quitted England, and landed in India in the early part of 1808 "I ascertained, on arriving in the presidency, that I was to proceed immediately to the endets' quarters at Cuddalore, that a tent would be furmished me by government, and that the sum total of my pay and allowances would be thirty two pagodas monthly, twelve pagodas being deducted as rent for the quarters which would be allotted me My tent, according to regulations, was shared with another cadet, and from our inexpenence of what was really necessary, we departed with twice the requisite quantity of baggage and of attendance

The year at Cuddalore was spent by me, as it was by others, in more than a sinflicent quantity of dnils, disobedience, riots, imprisonments, and, I regret to any, drunkenness Shut out from all society, with none who cared for us in aught beyond the routine of military duty—the few seniors leading, and the majority, unfielded boys of fifteen, following their guidance—introducing wine and liquors, rather because it was contrary to regulations, than agreeable to our taste—our time passed away in pursuits not only trifling, but mischievons. If ever one act of wisdom has been performed by the Indian authorities, it is the abolition of this apprenticeship to all that is least likely to dignify the military life.

At the expiration of my term of probetion, I was posted to the Sist regiment as third ensign, and proceeded to the presidency to join my corps

"This occurred in that year so memoreble to the Madras army, 1809 I am not about to enter in this place on a detail of the gnerances that drove us—for I was of the mutners—to extremitie a May the wiser heads of the present generation avert, by concession, and a proper regard for the soldier's interest, any repetition of that dangerous conjuncture! It should begin to be understood that an exas perated army—but I will not anticipate. Time will unfold if that is a syet hidden in its miread pages. Suffice it that, after remaining ten mouths at the presidency, the numerous band of officers found to be intractable were dispersed at different stations, and I, with many others, was ordered to Sadras.

"Three months we remained there in the unutierable bilss of idleness, and exemption from all military duty My soul looks back on that short period with meffable delight. There we were in the satisfactory consciousness of being engaged in a noble strangels for our rights, which dignified our inoccupation, and removed from our minds that unpleasant sensation of unimportance and intulity which complete indolence is apt to induce. These bisisful three months, however, expured at length, and we were ordered to Madras to sign the test, which was to restore us to the 'occupation that had gone'

"One month sufficed for our abode in that capital city of dulness, produgality, self consequence, and ignorance, and we commenced a march to Hyderahad ,-pleasantest of all military stations, with variety enough to give zest to enjoyment, a society constantly fluctuating, and from its numerical strength, possessing capabilities of sufficient amusement! Happily floated away, on gay pinions, the year of my youth which there rose and waned? It was a moment of butter regret when the order arrived, removing me to the other battalion, and directing me to proceed forthwith to its head quarters at Wallahiahbad

"During this year I had been promoted to the rank of heutenant, and of course arrived at a higher gradation of pay, my additional rank putting me in the immediate re ceipt of one hundred and ninety sir rupees monthly,-a splendid income, as must be apparent to all those who will take the trouble to calculate the inevitable expenditure consequent on the military life in India, the frequency of my removal from station to station, the expense of march ing, and the mordinate price demanded for those European articles, both of dress and provision, which my profession in the one instance, and my health in the other, imperatively demanded !

"After a march of six weeks I arrived at Wallahiahbad, and was immediately detached to Poonamallee, forty miles from head-quarters There I enjoyed aix months of health and quiet, at the end of which period I rejoined the regi-ment, then under orders to march to Madras

"My corps had been one of the most prominent in the agitations that had lately alarmed the government, and it was suffering the usual effects of the indignation of petty tyrants It was removed capriciously from station to station a system which obviously could have but one design and tendency-to harase and 'break the spirits,' as they called it, both of officers and men We had not been five months at the presidency before we were ordered to return to Wallahjahbad, and short as the distance is, the changing of quarters can never be effected without expense and discomfort. If it be an axiom that military men should be kept poor, no system on earth is better calculated to render them so than frequent removals After six months' half (for I cannot call it abode) at Wallahjahbad, we were removed to Trichinopoly. The head quarters of the regi-ment were stationed there during two years and a half, of that period I passed six weeks on detachment at Dindigul, and eighteen months at Sankerry Droog, where I had some opportunity of recruiting my finances in the obscurity of its profound retirement. We marched next to Banga lore

"Two months had not elapsed from our arrival at that celebrated station, when his excellency the commander in chief and his staff arrived there. Amongst the military exhibitions usua on these occasions, a sudden and unexpected order was issued, that my regiment should parade for the purpose of being inspected &c It paraded accordingly, but from some inattention or thoughtlessness on the part either of the commandant or the adjutant, the men appeared in old clothing, although the new forthe current year had been issued some time Doubtless this was a negligence, and one which a high minded military man would not have visited with very high displeasure But in the eyes of a martinet, more distinguished for the desire of taking a prominent rôle than for talent to sustain it, it was an of fence of the deepest dye, and to be visited with punishment accordingly In the next day's orderly book, we found ourselves under orders to proceed forthwith to Seringapa tam, a measure unprecedented in the ennals of military history in India, at a season of profound peace. We had rut, as I have stated, been two months at Bangalore every other corps, in the usual course of things, was supposed to be for removal before our tour could occur Every feel ing of common justice opposed the pality tyranny More-over, it was sending our men to the very scene of conflict in which in the memorable 1809, they had encountered the party of dragoons and the Mysore horse Every bad feel ing was likely to be roused by their proximity to the fatal plain But the vindictive desire of revenging either past errors or present negligence, overcame considerations of prudence and policy, and with burning hearts men and officers soon found themselves cantoned in the pestilential climate of Seringanatam

"Four month's had not elapsed when I was ettacked with the dangerous fiver peculiar to the place, and was sent by the surgeon to Bangalore I remained there two months, but my illness augmented so much, and the symptoms were becoming so formidable, that it was deemed necessary to give me a certificate for Europe as the only chance of preserving my life

"After nearly eight yéars' service, after having travers ed so many thousand miles in useless fatigue, with all my multiary axious damped, by majorina vapina. Jeon axio, having never enjoyed an moome exceeding two hondred a year, I found myself on the eve of embarking for my nearly land, under circumstances of most painful urgency with no resources except the pittance allowed by the government, and the noble addition furnished by one of the finest institutions in the world, the military fund. From the former I received fifteen hundred rupees, as passage money, from the latter, four hundred rupees for equipment, from the government ninety two pounds' per annum in England, from the fund, an addition which augmented my income to one hundred and forty pounds But even with this addition, magnificent as it is on the part of the fund, how small were the comforts a sick man was able to procure! My malady was of that nature which rendered medical aid indispensable, and no luxury in the world is more expensive A poor gentleman, of all others, can least afford to be ill. The company lend no aid to that unfortunate portion of their servants who are so situated, beyond the pittance of the net pay of their rank. Here is no institution to afford that professional advice and assistance which is absolutely essential, and it is in this point that a company's officer is likely to contrast his aituation with that of his brethren of the king's service with the least pleasurable feelings For myself, I was compelled to become a pensioner on my own family during the greater portion of my residence at home, which was prelonged by permission, from unavoidable circumstances, to a period exceeding four years

<sup>45</sup> Early in October, 1820, I revisited the Indian shore, recovered certainly, but with a constitution considerably enfeabled. I rejoined my corps at Chittledrong, and was immediately detached to Hurryhur, on the banks of the Toongabudra. After a squourn there of two months, I returned to head quarters, and found the regiment had proceeded on route to Nagpore, intending to halt at Bellary, that scarcely arrived there, and given by my detachment, when from augmentation and arrangements in the army, which it is not necessary to discuss here, I was removed which it is not necessary to discuss here, I was removed.

to the 164th

of the 1941 "The 1941 was then under orders to canton at Bellary, and I found its commanding officer there as a time its and 1 found to commanding the permission to the garand, thouse exceeded no dokuming the permission of the garand, thouse exceeded no dokuming the permission of the garand, the permission of the garand, the permission of the permission of procured quarters accordingly, and made myself as sing as circumstances allowed I had scarcely had a week's enjoyment of my comforts, when I was suprissed by a visif from my commandant, whose object was to communicate his very unexpected revocation of his former leave, and his desire that I would proceed forthwith, and join my regiment on its route. All remonstrance was vain, capricious he was, and obstinate withal, and reasoning had as little influence on him as persuasion. I had no alternative, and with greater reluctance than I had ever felt on an occasion of marching. I made my preparations for this enforced and most useless journey

Now increased to one hundred and ten pounds, or thereabouts, I

"I proceeded with all the lingering delay characteristic of actions forced upon the will In process of time, I found myself ten miles from Wallahjahbad, which the 164th had not yet quitted. My aversion to join amounting to abso lute renugnance, I hazarded disobedience to orders, and directed my steps to the presidency. I remained there a few days only, and proceeded to Wallahjahbad, being in possession of the intelligence that the regiment had marched during that interval I immediately followed in its wake, and at Chittoor nearly overtook it But here I re ceived intelligence which entirely removed any slight in tention I might have had of joining, I heard that sickness had broken out amongst the sepoys, and that it would be prudent to keep two or three marches in the rear I fol lowed this counsel very minutely, but this did not entirely ensure my safety In crossing the ghillit I had a slight attack, but, not being much addicted to nervous alarms, I was fortunate enough to suffer little, and for a short time only I arrived in safety at Bellary, having joined in the course of the two last marches

"I had not been two months in quarters when I was removed to the first battahon, then stationed at Berhampore, in Orissa I reached head quarters in January, 1822, and was shortly detached to Kemidee I remained five months, and, after a fortnight's interval ut Berhampore, I was again detached to Aska There I had a year and a haif of as monotonous an existence as ever made man pro nounce the hours of life to be "weary, stale, flat, and un profitable," but at the end of that period the monotony was broken by a fever of the most severe and distressing na ture I was removed immediately to Berhampore, but on recovering sufficiently, I effected my return to the detach ment, finding nothing particularly delightful with the main The air of Aska, however, was manifestly most hostile to me, and after a very few weeks I was compelled again to quit, and rejoin the head-quarters. As soon as possible I went to Ganjam, but it was the very depth of the monsoon, and a measure indicative of little less than madness in my state of health at that time. An iron constitution bore me through, however, if not unscathed, at least with life I returned to Berhampore, and thence on sick certificate to the presidency

2

"During the last three years, I had had two additional commissions, the first in 1822 giving me the brevet rank of captain, and the other in 1824, bestowing on me that rank bond fide, with all the additional pay and allowances thereunto belonging. At the same period there was an augmentation of pay through every rank of the army, and I ascended at once from one hundred and mnety to nearly four hundred rupees monthly-a very considerable influx of prosperity, that in some measure compensated the se vere disease which was afflicting me

"The severity of the fever was not mitigated by change of air After a few months of trial and perhaps of dan gerous delay, a second voyage to Europe was deemed necessary for me But my elevation to superior rank had excluded me from any assistance from government, and the prosecution of my voyage was effected by the aid of the Fund In Engla id I received something less than 200/ per annum, and of course, as far as regarded medical aid, I was in the same predicament precisely as during my sub alternship, and, in truth, found my finances so much with in my expenditure, as to be compelled to return to India

before the expiration of my furlough
I found my regiment at Nagpore Unable to join du ring the monsoon, I asked and obtained leave to do duty with another corps After the lapse of five months, I reach ed head-quarters in the month of December, under the in fluence of as bright a sky and as cool an air, at that sea son, as is to be found within the tropics. After a resi dence of two years in camp, we were again under orders to march to the Northern Circurs Our route lay through the famous Chandah jungle, and an exceedingly unfavour able season again tried me to the utmost I was left with a detachment three marches from head-quarters, and lin gered under an attack of fever during three months, when I was again sent to the coast The sea air, in as genial a climate as this country affords, produced no beneficial ef fect, and I am again recommended to return to England, with an assurance that to live in India will, in future, be impossible for me I have been borne on the strength of the Company's army twenty five years, and I have una voidably been compelled to pass seven years of that period in Europe, consequently, I have not served in India the prescribed period-twenty two years, and am not entitled to the retiring pay of my rank, there being, to my knowedge, no admissible exception to this absolute rule. My half pay will be granted to me, but with a broken constitution, how shall I exist on the pittance? I have no funds, no fortune, to ald me "I cannot dig, to beg I am adhamed I".

GOING HOME.

LANCLAGE has no power to describe the emotions which these words excite in the heart of the exile. The careworn—the bereaved—the "sick unto death"—rejoice in every pulse when they catch the first whisper of this blessed hope. It tells of ten thousand blessings that gladdened their early years, ten thousand ties from which they have been severed, of health, of comfort, of peace, and love No! earth has no balm equal to the nower of this hope in the healing of the wounds of the spirit broken

And, oh to trace back, link by link, to the other extremity of the chain, and then to recall the different state of excitement which marked the wayfarer's embarkation on his first "coming out" Then "Hope shook her radiant locks," and earth seemed about to unlock ber choicest treasury of honours and of blessings A long perspective of wealth and distinction lay before him And there were other animating prospects too, less mercenary, the region to which he was proceeding lay before his eye, clad in all the colours with which his young fancy had decked her He thought of her gorgeous palaces, and the rich array of her nobles and princes -of jewelled crest and cimeter, radiant with the spoils of the diamond mine He anticipated also the clear, deep streams, which intersect the land, the boundless landscape, the mountain wilderness, the forest home of the kingly tiger, the varieties of animal creation, the rich and gorgeous flowers, the luscious fruits, the inhabitants, so singular in their story of immutable customs, of unproselyting superstition What a rich fund of legendary lore he would acquire from this curious peo ple! How accurately he would observe their customs, how he would mingle with them, and scatter the seeds from which hereafter fruit might spring 1 Ay, then indeed his heart beat gayly, and if its pulse throbbed with sadden ed impulse when he turned back his thoughts to those he had quitted, to the forests and the fields he had loved, it was but for a moment. He thought it "a sober certainty of waking bliss," that he should return to add to their wealth and to gladden them with the announcement of his well earned honours

And now he has been long awakened from that young dream He has passed, perchance, through years of toil and suffering to return prematurely to the land of his youth He has no riches to add to the prosperity of those best loved, he has but a pittance sufficient to sustain his painful existence, and now his empty honours "are weighed in the balance, and found wanting" Or perhaps he is one of the prosperous His constitution has received no severe miur. He has accumulated ample fortune, and he goes to realize some of the projects of his boyish days, to pur-chase an estate here—to build a house there—to befriend this individual-to retaliate on that a whole catalogue of luuries, that choicest hoard of memory, of which she never loses one grain! But, alas! the spring of heart that would have exulted over this prosperity, is gone forever! Its deadened pulse requires stronger excitement for enjoyment. He has many cherished habits to relinquish, he has to acquire tastes for the brightest and best intellectual refinements of a society in the very height of civilization, and he has the more difficult task of forgetting what have been his habits Oh, no' Going home is the only consolation left, but even that cannot restore all that time and adverse circumstances have taken away l

Reflections of this nature, however, rarely disturb the mind during the voyage. When the wind blows freshly and fairly, and every moment brings the vessel nearer to its port the saddest heart beats more cheerfully, and the pulse of the invalid becomes more healthy. The very children participate in the Joyousness around, soon forget ting in their season of sunshine, that they have left all most fondly interested for them, and are too frequently about to experience the "tender merces" of strangers.

Yes, in almost every ship homeward bound, there are many of these little passengers, whom hard necessity compels parents to send to England for the benefit of education. This is a gravous subtraction from the happiness of an existence spent in India. No thinking parent can ever resign his child to guardians, bowever trusted, over whom he can exercise no surveillance, without a pang of keen regret. Indeed, so pauful is the trial, that many nothers shrink from encountering it, and keep their child in India to an age far more advanced than wisdom would deem prudent. Nowhere do children imbble impressions of the most lamentable kind sooner than in India No caution

can entirely prevent this eval, for at this infantia age they must necessarily be left much to the care of ayais, and other servants, none of whom have a sense of the necessity of avoiding any thing the most revolting to an Europe an mind, in consideration of their charge Indeed, in major cases, it would be impossible to convince them that such an avoidance was requisite or desirable, and therefore every judicious parent will be attitude to the carbiest clink from the influence of moral contagion at the earliest possible period. As to intellectual cultimost children are placed and the confidence of a dequate education is to be found throughout India.

Children however, are the most joy inspiring of all pas sengers. Reckless of danger, unknowing of any evil pres ent or future, their happy faces always ensure their welcome in the cuddy. The most careworn brow smooths its wrin kles at their approach, and the very saliors derive confi dence from their assurance of safety when a young child is in their resseq.

There are some, however, to whom joy and hope are long unknown Yonder pale female, who leans over the tafferel, and strains her eye so intensely, in order to catch the last faint outline of the Indian shore, is a new made widow She is bereft of the husband of her love, and she leaves his ashes in that to her inhospitable land It is true, she is returning to friends, to kinsmen, but who can com pensate to her the loss of him with whom she first traversed the mighty ocean-with whom she has shared to many dangers, and so many joys, -of him to whose most faithful heart she was wont to confide all her feminine fears and terrors in the hour of trial, and whose voice always soothed and blessed? Who can search into the depths of her sor rows when her memory dwells-and when does it not dwell?-on the thousand blessings his tenderness shed over her pathway? None, like him, can understand her lookscan translate the very tones of her voice into indications of her heart—can patiently endure to see that heart laid bare before him, and reproach no foible, forgive every folly, extenuate every fault? She seeks the shelter of her soli tary cabin to give freer indulgence to her sorrow, - perhaps to hold communings with his spirit, whose presence appears almost sensible, or better still, to seek consolation from Him who is "the father of the fatherless, and the friend of the widow" She mingles little with the gayer ones around her she has no joyous laugh to respond to their mirth , she knows that the only prospect of her future existence is bound up in a small cottage-home in her own land, and her hope is excited most strongly when she most clearly pictures to herself its perfect retirement

Every day brings improvement to the sick, and in proportion to the restoration of their health is their vivacity Their minds recover their elasticity They forget that they have already been near enough to death to feel his? chilly touch, and they hegm to lay out plans for many years What anxious consulting of the compass there is amongst them, and how they examine the daily progress marked out on the chart! Some are husbands and fathers returning to the bosom of their family with ample compe tence, and well may their hearts dilate when they ontici pate the warm welcome so surely awaiting their arrival If visions of the death or suffering of ony of those beloved ones ever smite them, they turn with trembling from the cruel foreboding, and easily console themselves with the common anodyne to man's terrors of the evil day-that to them life has no delusion, the future no disappointment If the prudent man condemns this foible, and the cautious sneers at it, they who are blessed with this happier spirit, may console themselves in the incalculably greater felicity that morks their progress

That tall, thin, atrabihous looking personage, lounging against the tafferel with arms folded across his breost, just shutting in all his world, and eyes half closed in dignified abstraction is Colonel Peterkin He is a very old officer, has long since enjoyed the off reckonings, and for the last seven years has commanded a force, consequently, he has been in possession of authority little less than despotic, and power has made him ascribe to his own personal qualities a pre-eminence for which he was indebted only to his position. It is nearly forty years since he quitted the British shore, and he retains scarcely one distinctive quality of an Englishman Accustomed to obsequious def erence from the many, he has forgotten that he is about to merge in an immense moss of people, of whom none will care one atom for his dignity—none will move one step from his direct path to make way for him He keeps cloof, in solitary pride, from the contagion of intimacy, and imagines that he carries with him all those claims to distinction which he possessed in ladia. He has no idea of becoming one of the people, and has as perfect an assurance that he shall be numbered amongst the very thite of the aris-tocracy, as that he wears the insigma of the Bath at this precise moment. How severe a lessoo is he about to learn in the autumn of his life! It is more than probable that he will retreat from the severity of its rudiments, and return to his eastern theatre, to sustain a more important and distinguished rôle, before the expiration of one single year

That good tempered looking specimen of female per sonal plainness is Miss Marwell, an almost solitary excep tion to the universality of the axiom, that ' any woman may marry in India " She came out with a third or fourth cousin, married to a subaltero of cavalry-plain as any thing female can be, that is not positively to be called ugly, and a dreadful violation of all Indian rules of beauty Amongst the British sojourners in this eastern clime, Lord Byron's hatred of "dumpy women" is a sentiment ludi crously prevalent. To be sure in an atmosphere fluctua ting between 95° and 120° of Fahrenheit, a mountain of flesh is not the most attractive object in the world, and under its influence the taste for "fat, fair, and forty," is a branch of royal prerogative which few subjects would be hardy enough to invade There was no more valid im pediment why Miss Marwell should not attain unto matri mony Many hundreds as plain as she, and ten times more ignorant, and a hundred fold worse tempered, have achieved its honours. But "some are born to honours, and some have honours thrust on them," and it was Miss Marwell's fate to be within neither of these accidents Af ter seven years' trial, she returns, still good tempered, and with a constitution little impaired by the assaults of the ch mate, to pass the future of her existence on the very small competence she has the good fortune to call her own, and to enact the useful, if undignified part of "Aunt Rachel," to the four very troublesome children who are now sailing to England under the shelter of her fostering wing

The lady on the poop, reading the marbled-covered vol ume, is Mrs Z The warm tint of her complexion, and the lustrous darkness of her eyes, are infallible evidence of her eastern origin She is a very amlable and lovely specimen of her race, and exceedingly timid at the prospect of the mortifications and difficulties she anticipates on her debut in the circle of her husband's family But her mild and gentle manners offer the best and most admissible plea for her unavoidable defects, and her natural grace preserves her from any positive gaucheries Perhaps her very timldity may save her from the evils she dreads, and which a more ambitious spirit woold surely encounter To the honour of human nature let it be said, that very few are anxious to detect the errors of those whose humility seems to ask forbearance When there is no presumption, there can be no repulse The inevitable deficiencies of a woman, entirely educated in India, contain nothing in themselves to ment the derision of the sarcastic If, unfortunately, they present themselves in union with arrogance and pretension, they deserve the severity of the satire they are likely to Incur

Young -old,-the homble the proud,-wealth poverty -all are there and in all 'hope inhabits,"-however distinct its characteristics, still hope No !- there is one. to whom 'hope never comes that comes to all" There he stands, with eye bent upon the wave, lonely and apart, like one dark thunder cloud on a sunny sky, or a single blasted tree amidst a forest majestic in its world of ver-There is despair, in atl its sad, stern sameness Life has no light and shade for him -"darkness is over the face of the deep " The seal of the irrevocable past is upon him and his doom is hopelessoess, unless the grave shall yield up its dead. The many stand aloof, but there is one, graceful and grave, who never quits that sad companionship By day, by night, he is with him, watching him ever But not even his watchfulness can shut out from the pained listener who holds midnight vigil in the adia ceat cabin the outpourings of that strong remorse. He hears the voice of the unquiet spirit that cannot share the body's slumber, but wanders amidst the gloomy memories of irremediable guilt. The very air breathes hot and oppressive, as it passes, stilly and sultrily, over the brow of the adulterer and manslayer Yet is he no ruffian down of youth 10 yet on his cheek, and sadness seems a sad and unwonted guest in eves whose joyous colour is so meet for sunshipe "He is but the last victim of one single passion. The guilty wife has sonk under the pain of a wounded spirit,—and the husband—yonder shudder proclaims that he too is at rest. To this unhappy one, therefore, the prospect of home brings no joy—no hope. He carries within him the perpetual voice that will not let him even dream of happiness. There is a seeing within him, that will not suffer him to shut out his victims. His motions are resultes and uneasy the avoids the eyes of human beings and retreats often to his cabin, shunning the presence of mankind. But that solitude is peopled with phantasms worse than the reallifies from which he has fled, and he rushes again upon deck with burning eye and severed brow, to seek refuge from himself. The curse of Cain is on him,—he hath shed man's blood.

No mother ever watched her norshing as yonder brave mao attends the homeide He sees in 1 m only the brother of his youth—who shared the same cradle,—sported in the same field,—whose glad spirit gave the spring tide more of balm and flowers, whose laugh was gayer than the ca 250 COING ROME rol of the birds,-his check brighter than the first rose they gathered on their mother's birth day He was the daning of that mother too, -he had had her last blessing How her fondness had decked the vision of his future life with fairy wreaths of happiness and honour !- Well is it that she lived not to see how every leaf bad withered,-every blossom perished!

If one faint gleam of hope shall ever more shine on this man, it must be from that brother's wealth of love How intense,—how devoted '—He is about to resign his proud and bright prospects, so dear to the artlent spirit that has fed upon glory,-in the noon of manhood, to add to the very small income each brother inherits—the mite of his half-nay. He has bound himself to the voluntary penance of watching, in some obscure relreat, the future years of the spiritbroken;—to soothe melancholy gradually deepening into madness, and to find himself,—when the object of all his care shall sink unrejuctantly into the grave, for years his first, and now his last rest,—alone. No, not alone; com-panions may have forgotten,—friends may have deserted,

-but Gon and his own heart are with him still

After all, then, even "going home" is like all other human events,-a mingled tissue of joy and grief Truly it is so in its concomitant circumstances; but the abstract fact presents still an idea of unutterable bliss Perhaps, however, yonder couple taste the cup of joy in its purest and least alloyed deliciousness Are they lovers? No, there is loo confidential a manner about them, an air of too great friendship Their glances tell of pure affection, and have nothing to do with the rapture of passion They are husband and wife, and he, as his palled brow and hair prematurely gray Indicate, has reaped the ills of the climate She also has suffered, and pain has left traces of sadness on her forehead But the countenance of each is radiant with hope and thankfulness. And although perchance but a moderate competence awaits them, they glance with conscious satisfaction up to the deep blue sky, and enjoy with intense delight the full, the exquisite, the overpowering happiness which compensates for every suffering and every privation-

CONTENTS

	Page
Introductory	1
F rst Le ter to England	15
A Tour of Vis •	24
The Native Character	29
Manage uent	45
Journal of e Merch	60
A Legend of Berst	57
Le Vru n est pas ou oure le vraisemblably	74
La ter from Cal 12 a	90
Nourmahal—A B ographical fiketch	94
Doctor Paul	207
The Ball	ł12
Tuizah and Adje t	119
A Letter Home De Rebus Omn bue	126
Ske chee and H a a selec ed from my Correspondence	146
Cap ain Map e a M sfortunes	153
A Reco lee on	163
Co onel Scove 1	167
A Rambing Essay	174
P'ndarrie Anecdote	196
Le Petit Nez Re rouseé	191
A Young Lady a Le ter Home	200
The Three Mo. ge	209
The 8 ck Cert ficate	219
Captsin Philipson e Career 7	236
Golne Rome	-